That brightness in her eye she bore when Rome was free !

LXXXIII.

Oh thou, whose chariot roll'd on Fortune's wheel,
Triumphant Sylla ! Thou, who didst subdue Thy country's foes ere thou wouldst pause to feel
The wrath of thy own wrongs, or reap the due
Of hoarded vengeance till thine eagles flew O'er prostrate Asia ;—thou, who with thy frown
Annihilated senates—Roman, too,
With all thy vices, for thou didst lay down
With an atoning smile a more than earthly crown—

LXXXIV.

The dictatorial wreath,—couldst thou divine
To what would one day dwindle that which made
Thee more than mortal ? and that so supine
By aught than Romans, Rome should thus be laid ?
She who was named Eternal, and array'd
Her warriors but to conquer—she who veil'd

Earth with her haughty shadow, and display'd,
Until the o'er-canopied horizon fail'd,
Her rushing wings—Oh ! she who was Almighty hail'd !

LXXXV.

Sylla was first of victors ; but our own
The sagest of usurpers, Cromwell ; he Too swept off senates while he hew'd the throne
Down to a block—immortal rebel ! See
What crimes it costs to be a moment free
And famous through all ages ! but beneath
His fate the moral lurks of destiny ;
His day of double victory and death
Beheld him win two realms, and, happier, yield his breath.

LXXXVI.

The third of the same moon whose former course
Had all but crown'd him, on the selfsame day
Deposed him gently from his throne of force,
And laid him with the earth's preceding clay*.
And show'd not Fortune thus how fame and sway,
And all we deem delightful, and consume
Our souls to compass through each arduous way,
Are in her eyes less happy than the tomb ?
Were they but so in man's, how different were his doom !

LXXXVII.

And thou, dread statue ! yet existent in
The austere form of naked majesty,
Thou who beheldest, 'mid the assassin's' din,
At thy bath'd base the bloody Caesar lie,
Folding his robe in dying dignity,
An offering to thine altar from the queen
Of gods and men, great Nemesis ! did he die,
And thou, too, perish, Pompey ? have ye been Victors of countless kings, or puppets of a scene ?

LXXXVIII.

And thou, the thunder-stricken nurse of Rome !
She-wolf ! whose brazen-imaged dugs impart
The milk of conquest yet within the dome
Where, as a monument of antique art,
Thou standest :—Mother of the mighty heart,
Which the great founder suck'd from thy wild teat,
Scorched by the Roman Jove's ethereal dart,
And thy limbs black with lightning—dost thou yet
Guard thine immortal cubs, nor thy fond charge forget ?

LXXXIX.

Thou dost ; but all thy foster-babes are dead—
The men of iron ; and the world hath rear'd
Cities from out their sepulchres : men bled

* On the third of September Cromwell gained the victory of Dunbar ; a year afterwards he obtained " his crowning mercy " of Worcester ; and a few years after, on the same day, which he had ever esteemed the most fortunate for him, died.

In imitation of the things they fear'd,
And fought and conquer'd, and the same course steer'd,
At apish distance ; but as yet none have,
Nor could, the same supremacy have near'd,
Save one vain man, who is not in the grave,
But, vanquish'd by himself, to his own slaves a slave—

XC.

The fool of false dominion—and a kind
Of bastard Cæsar, following him of old
With steps unequal ; for the Roman's mind
Was modell'd in a less terrestrial mould*,
With passions fiercer, yet a judgment cold,
And an immortal instinct which redeem'd
The frailties of a heart so soft, yet bold,
Alcides with the distaff now he seem'd
At Cleopatra's feet,—and now himself he beam'd,

XCI.

And came—and saw—and conquer'd ! but the man [flee,
Who would have tamed his eagles down to
Like a train'd falcon, in the Gallic van,
Which he, in sooth, long led to victory,
With a deaf heart which never seem'd to be
A listener to itself, was strangely framed ;
With but one weakest weakness—vanity,
Coquettish in ambition—still he aim'd—
At what ? can he avouch—or answer what he claim'd ?

XCII.

And would be all or nothing—nor could wait
For the sure grave to level him ; few years
Had fix'd him with the Cæsars in his fate,
On whom we tread : For this the conqueror rears
The arch of triumph ! and for this the tears
And blood of earth flow on as they have flow'd,
An universal deluge, which appears
Without an ark for wretched man's abode,
And ebbs but to reflow !—Renew thy rainbow, God !

XCIII.

What from this barren being do we reap ?
Our senses narrow and our reason frail,
Life short, and truth a gem which loves the deep,
And all things weigh'd in custom's falsest scale ;

* It is possible to be a very great man and to be still very inferior to Julius Cæsar, the most complete character, so Lord Bacon thought, of all antiquity. Nature seems incapable of such extraordinary combinations as composed his versatile capacity, which was the wonder even of the Romans themselves. The first general—the only triumphant politician—inferior to none in eloquence—comparable to any in the attainments of wisdom, in an age made up of the greatest commanders, statesmen, orators and philosophers that ever appeared in the world—an author who composed a perfect specimen of military annals in his travelling carriage—at one time in a controversy with Cato, at another writing a treatise on punning, and collecting a set of good sayings—fighting and making love at the same moment, and willing to abandon both his empire and his mistress for a sight of the Fountains of the Nile. Such did Julius Cæsar appear to his contemporaries and to those of the subsequent ages, who were the most inclined to deplore and execrate his fatal genius.

But we must not be so much dazzled with his surpassing glory or with his magnanimous, his amiable qualities, as to forget the decision of his impartial countryman :

HE WAS JUSTLY SLAIN.

Opinion an omnipotence,—whose veil
Mantles the earth with darkness, until right
And wrong are accidents, and men grow pale
Lest their own judgments should become too
bright,
And their free thoughts be crimes, and earth have too much light.

XCIV.

And thus they plod in sluggish misery,
Rotting from sire to son, and age to age,
Proud of their trampled nature, and so die,
Bequeathing their hereditary rage
To the new race of inborn slaves, who wage
War for their chains, and rather than be free,
Bleed gladiator-like, and still engage
Within the same arena where they see
Their fellows fall before, like leaves of the same tree.

XCV.

I speak not of men's creeds—they rest between
Man and his Maker—but of things allow'd, Averr'd, and known,—and daily, hourly
seen—
The yoke that is upon us doubly bow'd,
And the intent of tyranny avow'd,
The edict of earth's rulers, who are grown
The apes of him who humbled once the proud,
And shook them from their slumbers on the throne ;
Too glorious, were this all his mighty arm had done.

XCVI.

Can tyrants but by tyrants conquer'd be,
And Freedom find no champion and no child
Such as Columbia saw arise when she Sprung forth a Pallas, arm'd and undefiled ?
Or must such minds be nourish'd in the wild ?
Deep in the unpruned forest, 'midst the roar
Of cataracts, where nursing Nature smiled
On infant Washington ? Has earth no more Such seeds within her breast, or Europe no such shore ?

XCVII.

But France got drunk with blood to vomit crime,
And fatal have her Saturnalia been
To Freedom's cause, in every age and clime ;
Because the deadly days which we have seen,
And vile Ambition, that built up between
Man and his hopes an adamant wall,
And the base pageant last upon the scene,
Are grown the pretext for the eternal thrall
Which nips life's tree, and dooms man's worst—his second fall.

XCVIII.

Yet, Freedom ! yet thy banner, torn, but flying,
Streams like the thunder-storm against the wind ;
Thy trumpet voice, though broken now and dying,
The loudest still the tempest leaves behind ;
Thy tree hath lost its blossoms, and the rind,

Chopp'd by the axe, looks rough and little worth,
But the sap lasts,—and still the seed we find
Sown deep, even in the bosom of the north ;
So shall a better spring less bitter fruit bring forth.

XCIX.

There is a stern round tower of other days*,
Firm as a fortress, with its fence of stone,
Such as an army's baffled strength delays,
Standing with half its battlements alone,
And with two thousand years of ivy grown,
The garland of eternity, where wave
The green leaves over all by time o'er-thrown ;
What was this tower of strength ? within its cave
What treasure lay so lock'd, so hid ?—A woman's grave.

C.

But who was she, the lady of the dead,
Tomb'd in a palace ? Was she chaste and fair ?
Worthy a king's—or more—a Roman's bed ?
What race of chiefs and heroes did she bear ?
What daughter of her beauties was the heir ?
How lived—how loved—how died she ? Was she not
So honour'd—and conspicuously there,
Where meaner relics must not dare to rot,
Placed to commemorate a more than mortal lot ?

CI.

Was she as those who love their lords, or they
Who love the lords of others ? such have been,
Even in the olden time Rome's annals say.
Was she a matron of Cornelia's mien,
Or the light air of Egypt's graceful queen,
Profuse of joy—or 'gainst it did she war,
Inveterate 'n virtue ? Did she lean
To the soft side of the heart, or wisely bar
Love from amongst her griefs ?—for such the affections are.

CII.

Perchance she died in youth : it may be, bow'd
With woes far heavier than the ponderous tomb
That weigh'd upon her gentle dust, a cloud
Might gather o'er her beauty, and a gloom
In her dark eye, prophetic of the doom
Heaven gives its favourites—early death ; yet shed
A sunset charm around her, and illumed
With hectic light, the Hesperus of the dead,
Of her consuming cheek the autumnal leaf-like red.

* Alluding to the tomb of Cecilia Metella, called Capo di Bove, in the Appian Way. See—Historical Illustrations of the IVth Canto of Childe Harold.

CIII.*

Perchance she died in age—surviving all,
Charms, kindred, children—with the silver
gray
On her long tresses, which might yet recal,
It may be, still a something of the day
When they were braided, and her proud array
And lovely form were envied, praised, and eyed
By Rome—But whither would conjecture
stray ?
Thus much alone we know—Metella died,
The wealthiest Roman's wife ; behold his love or pride !

CIV.

I know not why—but standing thus by thee
It seems as if I had thine inmate known,
Thou tomb ! and other days come back on me
With recollected music, though the tone
Is changed and solemn, like the cloudy groan
Of dying thunder on the distant wind ;
Yet could I seat me by this ivied stone
Till I had bodied forth the heated mind
Forms from the floating wreck which ruin leaves behind ;

CV.

And from the planks, far shatter'd o'er the rocks,
Built me a little bark of hope, once more
To battle with the ocean and the shocks
Of the loud breakers, and the ceaseless roar
Which rushes on the solitary shore
Where all lies founder'd that was ever dear :
But could I gather from the wave-worn store
Enough for my rude boat, where should I steer ?
There woos no home, nor hope, nor life, save what is here.

CVI.

Then let the winds howl on ! their harmony
Shall henceforth be my music, and the night
The sound shall temper with the owl's cry,
As I now hear them, in the fading light
Dim o'er the bird of darkness' native site,
Answering each other on the Palatine,
With their large eyes, all glistening gray and bright,
• And sailing pinions.—Upon such a shrine
What are our petty griefs ?—let me not number mine.

CVII.

Cypress and ivy, weed and wallflower grown
Matted and mass'd together, hillocks heap'd
On what were chambers, arch crush'd, column
strown
In fragments, choked up vaults, and frescos steep'd
In subterranean damps, where the owl peep'd, Deeming it midnight :—Temples, baths, or halls ?
Pronounce who can ; for all that learning
reap'd

CXXVII.

Yet let us ponder boldly—'tis a base
 Abandonment of reason to resign
 Our right of thought—our last and only place
 Of refuge ; this, at least, shall still be mine :
 Though from our birth the faculty divine
 Is chain'd and tortured—cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd,
 And bred in darkness, lest the truth should shine
 Too brightly on the unprepared mind,
 The beam pours in, for time and skill will couch the blind.

CXXVIII.

Arches on arches ! as it were that Rome,
 Collecting the chief trophies of her line,
 Would build up all her triumphs in one dome,
 Her Coliseum stands ; the moon beams shine
 As 'twere its natural torches, for divine
 Should be the light which streams here, to illumine
 This long-explored but still exhaustless mine
 Of contemplation ; and the azure gloom
 Of an Italian night, were the deep skies assume

CXXIX.

Hues which have words, and speak to ye of heaven,
 Floats o'er this vast and wondrous monument,
 And shadows forth its glory. 'There is given
 Unto the things of earth, which time hath bent,
 A spirit's feeling, and where he hath leant
 His hand, but broke his scythe, there is a power
 And magic in the ruin'd battlement,
 For which the palace of the present hour
 Must yield its pomp, and wait till ages are its dower.

CXXX.

Oh time ! the beautifier of the dead,
 Adorner of the ruin, comforter
 And only healer when the heart hath bled—
 Time ! the corrector where our judgments err,
 The test of truth, love,—sole philosopher,
 For all beside are sophists, from thy thrift,
 Which never loses though it doth defer—
 Time, the avenger ! unto thee I lift
 My hands, and eyes, and heart, and crave of thee a gift :

CXXXI.

Amidst this wreck, where thou hast made a shrine
 And temple more divinely desolate,
 Among thy mightier offerings here are mine,
 Ruins of years—though few, yet full of fate—
 If thou hast ever seen me too elate,
 Hear me not ; but if calmly I have borne
 Good and reserved my pride against the hate
 Which shall not whelm me, let me not have worn
 This iron in my soul in vain—shall they not mourn ?

CXXXII.

And thou, who never yet of human wrong
 Lost the unbalanced scale, great Nemesis !
 Here, where the ancient paid thee homage long—
 Thou, who didst call the furies from the abyss,
 And round, Orestes bade them howl and hiss
 For that unnatural retribution—just,
 Had it but been from hands less near—in this
 Thy former realm, I call thee from the dust !
 Dost thou not hear my heart ?—Awake ! thou shalt, and must.

CXXXIII.

It is not that I may not have incurr'd
 For my ancestral faults or mine the wound
 I bleed withal, and, had it been conferr'd
 With a just weapon, it had flow'd unbound ;
 But now my blood shall not sink in the ground ;
 'To thee I do devote it—thou shalt take
 The vengeance, which shall yet be sought and found,
 Which if I have not taken for the sake—
 But let that pass—I sleep, but thou shalt yet awake.

CXXXIV.

And if my voice break forth, 'tis not that now
 I shrink from what is suffer'd : let him speak
 Who hath beheld decline upon my brow,
 Or seen my mind's convulsion leave it weak ;
 But in this page a record will I seek.
 Not in the air shall these my words disperse,
 Though I be ashes ; a far hour shall wreak
 The deep prophetic fulness of this verse,
 And pile on human heads the mountain of my curse !

CXXXV.

That curse shall be forgiveness.—Have I not—
 Hear me, my mother earth ! behold it, Heaven !—
 Have I not had to wrestle with my lot ?
 Have I not suffer'd things to be forgiven ?
 Have I not had my brain sear'd, my heart riven,
 Hopes sapp'd, name blighted, life's life lied away ?
 And only not to desperation driven,
 Because not altogether of such clay
 As rots into the souls of those whom I survey.

CXXXVI.

From mighty wrongs to petty perfidy
 Have I not seen what human things could do ?
 From the loud roar of foaming calumny
 To the small whisper of the as paltry few,
 And subtler venom of the reptile crew,
 The Janus glance of whose significant eye,
 Learning to lie with silence, would seem true,
 And without utterance, save the shrug or sigh,
 Deal round to happy fools its speechless obloquy.

CXXXVII.

But I have lived, and have not lived in vain:
My mind may lose its force, my blood its fire,
And my frame perish even in conquering pain,

But there is that within me which shall tire
Torture and time, and breathe when I expire;
Something unearthly, which they deem not of,
Like the remember'd tone of a mute lyre,
Shall on their soften'd spirits sink, and move
In hearts all rocky now the late remorse of love.

CXXXVIII.

The seal is set.—Now welcome, thou dread power
Nameless, yet thus omnipotent, which here
Walks, in the shadow of the midnight hour
With a deep awe, yet all distinct from fear;
Thy haunts are ever where the dead walls
rear
Their ivy mantles, and the solemn scene
Derives from thee a sense so deep and clear
That we become a part of what has been,
And grow unto the spot, all-seeing but unseen.

CXXXIX.

And here the buzz of eager nations ran,
In murnur'd pity, or loud-roar'd applause,
As man was slaughter'd by his fellow man.
And wherefore slaughter'd? wherefore, but because
Such were the bloody Circus' genial laws,
And the imperial pleasure.—Wherefore not?
What matters where we fall to fill the maws
Of worms—on battle-plains or list'd spot?
Both are but theatres where the chief actors rot.

CXL.

I see before me the gladiator lie;
He leans upon his hand—his manly brow
Consents to death, but conquers agony,
And his drooped head sinks gradually low—
And through his side the last drops, ebbing
slow
From the red gash, fall heavy, one by one,
Like the first of a thunder-shower; and now
The arena swims around him—he is gone,
Ere ceased the inhuman shout which hail'd the wretch who won.

CXLI.

He heard it, but he heeded not—his eyes
Were with his heart, and that was far away;
He reck'd not of the life he lost nor prize,
But where his rude hut by the Danube lay,
There were his young barbarians all at play,
There was their Dacian mother—he, their sire,
Butcher'd to make a Roman holiday—
All this rush'd with his blood—Shall he expire
And unavenged?—Arise! ye Goths, and glut
* your ire!

CXLII.

But here, where Murder breathed her bloody-steam;
And here, where buzzing nations choked the
And roar'd or murmur'd like a mountain stream

Dashing or winding as its torrent strays;
Here, where the Roman million's blame or praise
Was death or life, the playthings of a crowd,
My voice sounds much—and fall the stars'
faint rays
On the arena void—seats crush'd—walls bow'd—
And galleries, where my steps seem echoes strangely loud.

CXLIII.

A ruin—yet what ruin! from its mass
Walls, palaces, half-cities, have been rear'd;
Yet oft the enormous skeleton ye pass
And marvel where the spoil could have appear'd.
Hath it indeed been plunder'd, or but clear'd?
Alas! developed, opens the decay,
When the colossal fabric's form is near'd:
It will not bear the brightness of the day,
Which streams too much on all years, man,
have reft away.

CXLIV.

But when the rising moon begins to climb
Its topmost arch, and gently pauses there;
When the stars twinkle through the loops of time,
And the low night-breeze waves along the air
The garland-forest, which the gray walls wear,
Like laurels on the bald first Cæsar's head*;
When the light shines serene but doth not glare,
Then in this magic circle raise the dead:
Heroes have trod this spot—'tis on their dust ye tread.

CXLV.

"While stands the Coliseum, Rome shall stand†;
"When falls the Coliseum, Rome shall fall;
"And when Rome falls—the world." From our own land
Thus spake the pilgrims o'er this mighty wall
In Saxon times, which we are wont to call Ancient; and these three mortal things are still
On their foundations, and unalter'd all;
Rome and her ruin past redemption's skill,
The world, the same wide den—of thieves, or what ye will.

CXLVI.

Simple, erect, severe, austere, sublime—
Shrine of all saints and temple of all gods,
From Jove to Jesus—spared and blest by
time‡;

* Suetonius informs us that Julius Cæsar was particularly gratified by that decree of the senate, which enabled him to wear a wreath of laurel on all occasions. He was anxious, not to show that he was the conqueror of the world, but to hide that he was bald. A stranger at Rome would hardly have guessed at the motive, nor should we without the help of the historian.

† This is quoted in the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire; and a notice of the Coliseum may be seen in the Historical Illustrations to the 14th Canto of Childe Harold.

‡ "Though plundered of all its treasures, except the ring which was necessary to preserve the aperture above; though exposed to repeated fires, though sometimes flooded by the river, and always open to the rain, no monument of equal antiquity is so

Looking tranquillity, while falls or nods
Arch, empire, each thing round thee, and man plods

His way through thorns to ashes—glorious dome!

Shalt thou not last? Time's scythe and tyrants' rods

Shiver upon thee—sanctuary and home
Of art and piety—Pantheon!—pride of Rome!

CXLVII.

Relic of nobler days, and noblest arts!

Despoil'd yet perfect, with thy circle spreads
A holiness appealing to all hearts—

To art a model; and to him who treads

Rome for the sake of ages, Glory sheds

Her light through thy sole aperture; to those

Who worship, here are altars for their beads;

And they who feel for genius may repose

Their eyes on honour'd forms, whose busts around them close*.

CXLVIII.

There is a dungeon, in whose dim drear light†

What do I gaze on? Nothing: Look again!

Two forms are slowly shadow'd on my sight—

Two insulated phantoms of the brain:

It is not so; I see them full and plain—

An old man, and a female young and fair,

Fresh as a nursing mother, in whose vein

The blood is nectar:—but what doth she
there,

With her unmantled neck, and bosom white and bare?

CXLIX.

Full swells the deep pure fountain of young life,

Where on the heart and from the heart we took

Our first and sweetest nurture, when the wife

Blest into mother, in the innocent look,

Or even the piping cry of lips that brook

No pain and small suspense, a joy perceives

Man knows not, when from out its cradled nook

She sees her little bud put forth its leaves—

What may the fruit be yet?—I know not—Cain was Eve's.

CL.

But here youth offers to old age the food,

The milk of his own gift:—it is her sire

To whom she renders back the debt of blood

Born with her birth. No; he shall not expire

While in those warm and lovely veins the fire well preserved as this rotundo. It passed with little alteration from the Pagan into the present worship; and so convenient were its niches for the Christian altar, that Michael Angelo, ever suspicious of ancient beauty, introduced their design as a model to the Catholic church.*

Forryth's Remarks, &c. on Italy, page 137, see edit.

* The Pantheon has been made a receptacle for the busts of modern great, or, at least, distinguished, men. The flood of light which once fell through the large orb above on the whole circle of divinities, now shines on a numerous assemblage of mortals, some one or two of whom have been almost deified by the veneration of their countrymen.

† This and the three next stanzas allude to the story of the Roman daughter, which is recalled to the traveller, by the site or pretended site of that adventure now shown at the church of St. Nicholas in carcere. The difficulties attending the full belief of the tale are stated in Historical Illustrations, &c.

Of health and holy feeling can provide Great Nature's Nile, whose deep stream rises higher

Than Egypt's river:—from that gentle side

Drink, drink and live, old man! Heaven's realm holds no such tide.

CLI.

The starry fable of the milky way

Has not thy story's purity; it is

A constellation of a sweeter ray,

And sacred Nature triumphs more in this

Reverse of her decree, than in the abyss

Where sparkle distant worlds:—Oh, holiest nurse!

No drop of that clear stream its way shall miss

To thy sire's heart, replenishing its source

With life, as our freed souls rejoin the universe.

CLII.

Turn to the Mole which Hadrian rear'd on high*,

Imperial mimic of old Egypt's piles,

Colossal copyist of deformity,

Whose travell'd phantasy from the far Nile's

Enormous model, doom'd the artist's toils

To build for giants, and for his vain earth,

His shrunken ashes, raise this dome. How smiles

The gazer's eye with philosophic mirth,

To view the huge design which sprung from such a birth!

CLIII.

But lo! the dome—the vast and wondrous
dome†,

To which Diana's marvel was a cell—

Christ's mighty shrine above his martyr's tomb!

I have beheld the Ephesian's miracle—

Its columns strew the wilderness, and dwell

The hyæna and the jackal in their shade;

I have beheld Sophia's bright roofs swell

Their glittering mass i' the sun, and have survey'd

Its sanctuary the while the usurping Moslem pray'd;

CLIV.

But thou, of temples old, or altars new,

Standest alone—with nothing like to thee—

Worthiest of God, the holy and the true.

Since Zion's desolation, when that He

Forsook his former city, what could be,

Of earthly structures, in his honour piled,

Of a sublimer aspect? Majesty,

Power, glory, strength, and beauty, all are aisled

In this eternal ark of worship undefiled.

CLV.

Enter: its grandeur overwhelms thee not;

And why? it is not lessened; but thy mind,

Expanded by the genius of the spot,

Has grown colossal, and can only find

* The castle of St. Angelo.—See Historical Illustrations.

† This and the six next stanzas have a reference to the church of St. Peter's. For a measurement of the comparative length of this basilica, and the other great churches of Europe, see the pavement of St. Peter's, and the Classical Tour through Italy,
vol. ii. page 125. et seq. chap. iv.

A fit abode wherein appear enshrined
Thy hopes of immortality ; and thou
Shalt one day, if found worthy, so defined,
See thy God face to face, as thou dost now
His Holy of Holies, nor be blasted by his brow.

CLVI.

Thou movest—but increasing with the advance,
Like climbing some great Alp, which still doth rise,
Deceived by its gigantic elegance ;
Vastness which grows—but grows to harmonize—
All musical in its immensities ;
Rich marbles—richer painting—shrines where flame
The lamps of gold—and haughty dome which vies
In air with earth's chief structures, though their frame
Sits on the firm-set ground—and this the clouds must claim.

CLVII.

Thou seest not all ; but piecemeal thou must break,
To separate contemplation, the great whole ;
And as the ocean many bays will make,
That ask the eye—so here condense thy soul
To more immediate objects, and control
Thy thoughts until thy mind hath got by heart
Its eloquent proportions, and unroll
In mighty graduations, part by part,
The glory which at once upon thee did not dart,

CLVIII.

Not by its fault—but thine : our outward sense
Is but of gradual grasp—and as it is
That what we have of feeling most intense
Outstrips our faint expression ; even so this Outshining and o'erwhelming edifice
Fools our fond gaze, and greatest of the great
Defies at first our Nature's littleness,
Till, growing with its growth, we thus dilate
Our spirits to the size of that they contemplate.

CLIX.

Then pause, and be enlighten'd ; there is more
In such a survey than the sating gaze
Of wonder pleased, or awe which would adore
The worship of the place, or the mere praise
Of art and its great masters, who could raise
What former time, nor skill, nor thought could plan ;
The fountain of sublimity displays
Its depth, and thence may draw the mind of man
Its golden sands, and learn what great conceptions can.

CLX.

Or, turning to the Vatican, go see
Laocoon's torture dignifying pain—
A father's love and mortal's agony
With an immortal's patience blending :—vain
The struggle ; vain, against the coiling strain
And gripe, and deepening of the dragon's grasp,
The old man's clench ; the long envenom'd chain
Rivets the living links,—the enormous asp
Enforces pang on pang, and stifles gasp on gasp.

CLXI.

Or view the Lord of the unerring bow,
The God of life, and poesy, and light—
The Sun in human limbs array'd, and brow
All radiant from his triumph in the fight ;
The shaft hath just been shot—the arrow bright
With an immortal's vengeance ; in his eye
And nostril beautiful disdain, and might,
And majesty, flash their full lightnings by,
Developing in that one glance the Deity.

CLXII.

But in his delicate form—a dream of love,
Shaped by some solitary nymph, whose breast
Long'd for a deathless lover from above,
And madden'd in that vision—are express'd
All that ideal beauty ever bless'd
The mind with in its most unearthly mood,
When each conception was a heavenly guest—
A ray of immortality—and stood,
Starlike, around, until they gather'd to a god !

CLXIII.

And if it be Prometheus stole from Heaven
The fire which we endure, it was repaid
By him to whom the energy was given
Which this poetic marble hath array'd
With an eternal glory—which, if made
By human hands, is not of human thought ;
And Time himself hath hallow'd it, nor laid
One ringlet in the dust—nor hath it caught
A tinge of years, but breathes the flame with which 'twas wrought.

CLXIV.

But where is he, the pilgrim of my song,
The being who upheld it through the past ?
Methinks he cometh late and tarries long.
He is no more—these breathings are his last ;
His wanderings done, his visions ebbing fast,
And he himself as nothing :—if he was
Aught but a phantasy, and could be class'd
With forms which live and suffer—let that pass—
His shadow fades away into destruction's mass

CLXV.

Which gathers shadow, substance, life, and all
That we inherit in its mortal shroud,
And spreads the dim and universal pall
Through which all things grow phantoms ;
and the cloud
Between us sinks and all which ever glow'd,
Till glory's self is twilight, and displays

A melancholy halo scarce allow'd
To hover on the verge of darkness ; rays
Sadder than saddest night, for they distract the gaze,

CLXVI.

And send us prying into the abyss,
To gather what we shall be when the frame
Shall be resolv'd to something less than this
Its wretched essence ; and to dream of fame,
And wipe the dust from off the idle name
We never more shall hear,—but never more,
Oh, happier thought ! can we be made the same :

It is enough in sooth that once we bore
These fardels of the heart—the heart whose sweat was gore.

CLXVII.

Hark ! forth from the abyss a voice proceeds,
A long low distant murmur of dread sound,
Such as arises when a nation bleeds
With some deep and immedicable wound ;
Through storm and darkness yawns the rending ground, [chief
The gulf is thick with phantoms, but the Seems royal still, though with her head dis-crown'd,
And pale, but lovely, with maternal grief
She clasps a babe, to whom her breast yields no relief.

CLXVIII.

Scion of chiefs and monarchs, where art thou ?
Fond hope of many nations, art thou dead ?
Could not the grave forget thee, and lay low
Some less majestic, less beloved head ?
In the sad midnight, while thy heart still bled,
The mother of a moment, o'er thy boy, [fled
Death hush'd that pang for ever : with thee
The present happiness and promised joy
Which fill'd the imperial isles so full it seem'd to cloy.

CLXIX.

Peasants bring forth in safety.—Can it be,
Oh thou that wert so happy, so adored !
Those who weep not for kings shall weep for thee, [board
And Freedom's heart, grown heavy, cease to
Her many griefs for ONE : for she had pour'd
Her orisons for thee, and o'er thy head
Beheld her iris.—Thou, too, lonely lord,
And desolate consort—vainly wert thou wed !
The husband of a year ! the father of the dead !

CLXX.

Of sackcloth was thy wedding garment made ;
Thy bridal's fruit is ashes : in the dust
The fair-hair'd Daughter of the Isles is laid,
The love of millions ! How we did entrust Futurity to her ! and, though it must Darken above our bones, yet fondly deem'd
Our children should obey her child, and bless'd
Her and her hoped-for seed, whose promise seem'd
Like stars to shepherds' eyes :—'twas but a meteor beamed.

CLXXI.

Woe unto us, not her ; for she sleeps well :
The fickle reek of popular breath, the tongue
Of hollow-counsel, the false oracle,
Which from the birth of monarchy hath rung
Its knell in princely ears, till the o'erstung
Nations have arm'd in madness, the strange fate*
Which tumbles mightiest sovereigns, and hath flung
Against their blind omnipotence a weight
Within the opposing scale, which crushes soon or late,—

CLXXII.

These might have been her destiny : but no,
Our hearts deny it : and so young, so fair,
Good without effort, great without a foe ;
But now a bride and mother—and now there !
How many ties did that stern moment tear !
From thy sire's to his humblest subject's breast
Is link'd the electric chain of that despair, Whose shock was as an earthquake's, and oppress
The land which lov'd thee so that none could love thee best.

CLXXIII.

Lo, Nemi† ! navell'd in the woody hills
So far, that the uprooting wind which tears
The oak from his foundation, and which spills
The ocean o'er its boundary, and bears
Its foam against the skies, reluctant spares
The oval mirror of thy glassy lake ;
And, calm as cherish'd hate, its surface wears
A deep cold settled aspect nought can shake,
All coiled into itself and round, as sleeps the snake.

CLXXIV.

And near Albano's scarce divided waves
Shine from a sister valley ;—and afar
The Tiber winds, and the broad ocean laves
The Latian coast where sprung the Epic war,
" Arms and the Man," whose re-ascending star
Rose o'er an empire ;—but beneath thy right
Tully repos'd from Rome ;—and where yon bar
Of girdling mountains intercepts the sight
The Sabine farm was till'd, the weary bard's delight.

CLXXV.

But I forget.—My pilgrim's shrine is won,
And he and I must part,—so let it be,—
His task and mine alike are nearly done ;
Yet once more let us look upon the sea ;
The midland ocean breaks on him and me,

* Mary died on the scaffold : Elizabeth of a broken heart.
Charles V. a hermit ; Louis XIV. a bankrupt in means and glory ; Cromwell of anxiety ; and, " the greatest is behind," Napoleon lives a prisoner. To these sovereigns a long but superfluous list might be added of names equally illustrious and unhappy.

† The village of Nemi was near the Arician retreat of Ageria, and from the shades which encompassed the temple of Diana, has preserved to this day its distinctive appellation of The Grove.
Nemi is but an evening's ride from the comfortable inn of Albano.

And from the Alban Mount we now behold
Our friend of youth, that ocean, which when we
Beheld it last by Calpe's rock unfold
Those waves, we follow'd on till the dark
Euxine roll'd

CLXXXVI.

Upon the blue Symplegades : long years—
Long, though not very many, since have done
Their work on both ; some suffering and some tears

Have left us nearly where we had begun :
Yet not in vain our mortal race hath run,
We have had our reward—and it is here ;
That we can yet feel gladden'd by the sun,
And reap from earth, sea, joy almost as dear
As if there were no man to trouble what is clear.

CLXXXVII.

Oh ! that the desert were my dwelling-place,
With one fair spirit for my minister,
That I might all forget the human race,
And, hating no one, love but only her !
Ye elements !—in whose ennobling stir
I feel myself exalted—Can ye not Accord me such a being ? Do I err
In deeming such inhabit many a spot ?
Though with them to converse can rarely be our lot.

CLXXXVIII.

There is a pleasure in the pathless woods,
There is a rapture on the lonely shore,
There is society, where none intrudes,
By the deep sea, and music in its roar :
I love not man the less, but nature more,
From these our interviews, in which I steal
From all I may be, or have been before,
To mingle with the universe, and feel
What I can ne'er express, yet cannot all conceal.

CLXXXIX.

Roll on, thou deep and dark blue ocean—roll !
Ten thousand fleets sweep over thee in vain ;
Man marks the earth with ruin—his control
Stops with the shore ;—upon the watery plain
The wrecks are all thy deed, nor doth remain
A shadow of man's ravage, save his own,
When, for a moment, like a drop of rain,
He sinks into thy depths with bubbling groan,
Without a grave, unkenn'd, uncoffin'd, and unknown.

CLXXX.

His steps are not upon thy patha,—thy fields
Are not a spoil for him,—thou dost arise
And shake him from thee ; the vile strength
he wields
For earth's destruction thou dost all despise,
Spurning him from thy bosom to the skies,
And send'st him, shivering in thy playful spray
And howling, to his gods, where haply lies
His petty hope in some near port or bay,
And dashest him again to earth :—there let him lay.

CLXXXI.

The armaments which thunderstrike the walls
Of rock-built cities, bidding nations quake,
And monarchs tremble in their capitals,
The oak leviathans, whose huge ribs make
Their clay creator the vain title take
Of lord of thee, and arbiter of war ;
These are thy toys, and, as the snowy flake,
They melt into thy yeast of waves, which mar
Alike the Armada's pride, or spoils of Trafalgar.

CLXXXII.

Thy shores are empires, changed in all save
thee—
Assyria, Greece, Rome, Carthage, what are they ?
Thy waters wasted them while they were free
And many a tyrant since ; their shores obey
The stranger, slave, or savage ; their decay
Has dried up realms to deserts :—not so thou,
Unchangeable save to thy wild waves' play—
Time writes no wrinkle on thine azure brow—
Such as creation's dawn beheld, thou rollest now.

CLXXXIII.

Thou glorious mirror, where the Almighty's form
Glasses itself in tempests ; in all time,
Calm or convuls'd—in breeze, or gale, or storm,
Icing the pole, or in the torrid clime
Dark-heaving ;—boundless, endless, and sublime—
The image of eternity—the throne
Of the Invisible ; even from out thy slime
The monsters of the deep are made ; each zone
Obeys thee ; thou goest forth, dread, fathomless, alone.

CLXXXIV.

And I have loved thee, Ocean ! and my joy
Of youthful sports was on thy breast to be Borne, like thy bubbles, onward : from a boy
I wanton'd with thy breakers—they to me
Were a delight ; and if the freshening sea
Made them a terror—'twas a pleasing fear,
For I was as it were a child of thee,
And trusted to thy billows far and near,
And laid my hand upon thy mane—as I do here.

CLXXXV.

My task is done—my song hath ceased—my theme
Has died into an echo ; it is fit
The spell should break of this protracted dream.
The torch shall be extinguish'd which hath lit
My midnight lamp—and what is writ, is writ,—
Would it were worthier ! but I am not now
That which I have been—and my visions fit
Less palpably before me—and the glow
Which in my spirit dwelt, is fluttering, faint and low.

CLXXXVI.

Farewell! a word that must be, and hath been—

A sound which makes us linger ;—yet—farewell!

Ye! who have traced the pilgrim to the scene Which is his last, if in your memories dwell

A thought which once was his, if on ye swell A single recollection, not in vain

He wore his sandal-shoon, and scallop-shell ;

Farewell! with him alone may rest the pain, If such there were—with you, the moral of his strain!

THE DREAM.

I.

OUR life is twofold. Sleep hath its own world,
A boundary between the things misnamed
Death and existence. Sleep hath its own world,
And a wide realm of wild reality,
And dreams in their development have breath,
And tears, and tortures, and the touch of joy ;
They leave a weight upon our waking thoughts,
They take a weight from off our waking toils,
They do divide our being ; they become
A portion of ourselves as of our time,
And look like heralds of eternity ;
They pass like spirits of the past,—they speak
Like sibyls of the future ; they have power—
The tyranny of pleasure and of pain ;
They make us what we were not—what they will,
And shake us with the vision that's gone by,
The dread of vanish'd shadows—Are they so ?
Is not the past all shadow? What are they?
Creations of the mind?—The mind can make
Substance, and people planets of its own
With beings brighter than have been, and give
A breath to forms which can outlive all flesh.
I would recall a vision which I dream'd
Perchance in sleep—for in itself a thought,
A slumbering thought, is capable of years,
And curdles a long life into one hour.

II.

I saw two beings in the hues of youth
Standing upon a hill, a gentle hill,
Green and of mild declivity, the last
As 'twere the cape of a long ridge of such,
Save that there was no sea to lave its base,
But a most living landscape, and the wave
Of woods and cornfields, and the abodes of men
Scatter'd at intervals, and wreathing smoke
Arising from such rustic roofs ;—the hill
Was crown'd with a peculiar diadem
Of trees, in circular array, so fix'd,
Not by the sport of nature, but of man :
These two, a maiden and a youth, were there
Gazing—the one on all that was beneath
Fair as herself—but the boy gazed on her ;
And both were young, and one was beautiful :
And both were young—yet not alike in youth ;

As the sweet moon on the horizon's verge,
The maid was on the eve of womanhood ;
The boy had fewer summers, but his heart
Had far outgrown his years, and to his eye
There was but one beloved face on earth,
And that was shining on him ; he had look'd
Upon it till it could not pass away ;
He had no breath, no being, but in hers ;
She was his voice ; he did not speak to her,
But trembled on her words ; she was his sight,
For his eye follow'd hers, and saw with hers,
Which colour'd all his objects :—he had ceased
To live within himself ; she was his life,
The ocean to the river of his thoughts,
Which terminated all : upon a tone,
A touch of hers, his blood would ebb and flow,
And his cheek change tempestuously—his heart
Unknowing of its cause of agony.

But she in these fond feelings had no share :
Her sighs were not for him ; to her he was Even as a brother—but no more ; 'twas much,
For brotherless she was, save in the name
Her infant friendship had bestow'd on him ;—
Herself the solitary scion left
Of a time-honour'd race.—It was a name
Which pleased him, and yet pleased him not and why?

Time taught him a deep answer—when she loved

Another ; even now she loved another,
And on the summit of that hill she stood
Looking afar if yet her lover's steed
Kept pace with her expectancy, and flew.

III.

A change came o'er the spirit of my dream.
There was an ancient mansion, and before
Its walls there was a steed caparison'd :
Within an antique oratory stood
The boy of whom I spake ;—he was alone,
And pale, and pacing to and fro : anon
He sat him down, and seized a pen, and traced Words which I could not guess of ; then he lean'd
His bow'd head on his hands, and shook as 'twere

With a convulsion—then arose again,
And with his teeth and quivering hands did tear
What he had written, but he shed no tears.
And he did calm himself, and fix his brow
Into a kind of quiet : as he paused,
The lady of his love re-enter'd there ;
She was serene and smiling then, and yet
She new she was by him beloved,—she knew,
For quickly comes such knowledge, that his heart

Was darken'd with her shadow, and she saw
That he was wretched, but she saw not all.
He rose, and with a cold and gentle grasp
He took her hand ; a moment o'er his face
A tablet of unutterable thoughts
Was traced, and then it faded, as it came ;
He dropp'd the hand he held, and with slow steps

For they did part with mutual smiles ; he pass'd
Retired, but not as bidding her adieu,
From out the massy gate of that old Hall,
And mounting on his steed he went his way ;
And ne'er repass'd that hoary threshold more.

IV.

A change came o'er the spirit of my dream.
The boy was sprung to manhood : in the wilds
Of fiery climes he made himself a home,
And his soul drank their sunbeams ; he was girt
With strange and dusky aspects ; he was not Himself like what he had been ; on the sea
And on the shore he was a wanderer ;
There was a mass of many images
Crowded like waves upon me, but he was
A part of all ; and in the last he lay
Reposing from the noontide sultriness,
Couch'd among fallen columns, in the shade
Of ruin'd walls that had survived the names
Of those who rear'd them ; by his sleeping side
Stood camels grazing, and some goodly steeds
Were fasten'd near a fountain ; and a man
Clad in a flowing garb did watch the while,
While many of his tribe slumber'd around :
And they were canopied by the blue sky,
So cloudless, clear, and purely beautiful,
That God alone was to be seen in heaven.

V.

A change came o'er the spirit of my dream.
The lady of his love was wed with one
Who did not love her better :—in her home,
A thousand leagues from his,—her native home,
She dwelt, begirt with growing infancy,
Daughters and sons of Beauty,—but behold !
Upon her face there was the tint of grief,
The settled shadow of an inward strife,
And an unquiet drooping of the eye
As if its lid were charged with unshed tears.
What could her grief be ?—she had all she loved,
And he who had so loved her was not there
To trouble with bad hopes, or evil wish,
Or ill-repress'd affliction, her pure thoughts.
What could her grief be ?—she had loved him not
Nor given him cause to deem himself beloved,
Nor could he be a part of that which prey'd
Upon her mind—a spectre of the past.

VI.

A change came o'er the spirit of my dream.
The wanderer was return'd.—I saw him stand
Before an altar—with a gentle bride ;
Her face was fair, but was not that which made
The starlight of his boyhood ;—as he stood
Even at the altar, o'er his brow there came
The selfsame aspect, and the quivering shock
That in the antique oratory shook
His bosom in its solitude ; and then—
As in that hour—a moment o'er his face
The tablet of unutterable thoughts
Was traced,—and then it faded as it came,
And he stood calm and quiet, and he spoke
The fitting vows, but heard not his own words,

And all things reel'd around him ; he could see
Not that which was, nor that which should have been—

But the old mansion, and the accustom'd hall,
And the remember'd chambers, and the place,
The day, the hour, the sunshine, and the shade,
All things pertaining to that place and hour,
And her who was his destiny, came back
And thrust themselves between him and the light :

What business had they there at such a time ?

VII.

A change came o'er the spirit of my dream.
The lady of his love ;—Oh ! she was changed
As by the sickness of the soul ; her mind
Had wander'd from its dwelling, and her eyes
They had not their own lustre, but the look
Which is not of the earth ; she was become
The queen of a fantastic realm ; her thoughts
Were combinations of disjointed things ;
And forms impalpable and unperceived
Of others' sight familiar were to hers.
And this the world calls frenzy ; but the wise
Have a far deeper madness, and the glance
Of melancholy is a fearful gift ;
What is it but the telescope of truth ?
Which strips the distance of its fantasies,
And brings life near in utter nakedness,
Making the cold reality too real !

VIII.

A change came o'er the spirit of my dream.
The wanderer was alone as heretofore,
The beings which surrounded him were gone,
Or were at war with him ; he was a mark
For blight and desolation, compass'd round
With hatred and contention ; pain was mix'd
In all which was served up to him, until,
Like to the Pontic monarch of old days*,
He fed on poisons, and they had no power,
But were a kind of nutriment ; he lived
Through that which had been death to many men,
And made him friends of mountains ; with the stars
And the quick Spirit of the universe
He held his dialogues ; and they did teach
To him the magic of their mysteries ;
To him the book of night was open'd wide,
And voices from the deep abyss reveal'd
A marvel and a secret—Be it so.

IX.

My dream was past ; it had no further change.
It was of a strange order, that the doom
Of these two creatures should be thus traced out
Almost like a reality—the one
To end in madness—both in misery.

* Mithridates of Pontus.

EPISTLE TO AUGUSTA.

I.

My sister! my sweet sister! if a name
 Dearer and purer were, it should be thine.
 Mountains and seas divide us, but I claim
 No tears, but tenderness to answer mine;
 Go where I will, to me thou art the same—
 A loved regret which I would not resign.
 There yet are two things in my destiny,—
 A world to roam through, and a home with thee.

II.

The first were nothing—had I still the last,
 It were the haven of my happiness,
 But other claims and other ties thou hast,
 And mine is not the wish to make them less.
 A strange doom is thy father's son's, and past
 Recalling, as it lies beyond redress;
 Reversed for him our grandsire's* fate of yore,—
 He had no rest at sea, nor I on shore.

III.

If my inheritance of storms hath been
 In other elements, and on the rocks
 Of perils, overlook'd or unforeseen,
 I have sustain'd my share of worldly shocks,
 The fault was mine; nor do I seek to screen
 My errors with defensive paradox;
 I have been cunning in mine overthrow,
 The careful pilot of my proper woe.

IV.

Mine were my faults, and mine be their reward.
 My whole life was a contest, since the day
 That gave me being, gave me that which marr'd
 The gift,—a fate, or will, that walk'd astray;
 And I at times have found the struggle hard,
 And thought of shaking off my bonds of clay:
 But now I fain would for a time survive,
 If but to see what next can well arrive.

V.

Kingdoms and empires in my little day
 I have outlived, and yet I am not old;
 And when I look on this, the petty spray
 Of my own years of trouble, which have roll'd
 Like a wild bay of breakers, melts away:
 Something—I know not what—does still uphold
 A spirit of slight patience;—not in vain,
 Even for its own sake, do we purchase pain.

VI.

Perhaps the workings of defiance stir
 Within me,—or perhaps a cold despair,
 Brought on when ills habitually recur,—
 Perhaps a kinder clime, or purer air,
 (For even to this may change of soul refer,
 And with light armour we may learn to bear,)

* Admiral Byron was remarkable for never making a voyage without a tempest. He was known to the sailors by the facetious name of "Foulweather Jack."

"But, though it were tempest-tom'd,
 Still his bark could not be lost."
 He returned safely from the wreck of the Wager (in Anson's voyage), and subsequently circumnavigated the world, many years after, as commander of a similar expedition.

Have taught me a strange quiet, which was not
 The chief companion of a calmer lot.

VII.

I feel almost at times as I have felt
 In happy childhood; trees, and flowers, and brooks,
 Which do remember me of where I dwelt
 Ere my young mind was sacrificed to books,
 Come as of yore upon me, and can melt
 My heart with recognition of their looks;
 And even at moments I could think I see
 Some living thing to love—but none like thee.

VIII.

Here are the Alpine landscapes which create
 A fund for contemplation;—to admire
 Is a brief feeling of a trivial date;
 But something worthier do such scenes inspire:
 Here to be lonely is not desolate,
 For much I view which I could most desire,
 And, above all, a lake I can behold
 Lovelier, not dearer, than our own of old.

IX.

Oh that thou wert but with me!—but I grow
 The fool of my own wishes, and forget
 The solitude which I have vaunted so
 Has lost its praise in this but one regret;
 There may be others which I less may show;—
 I am not of the plaintive mood, and yet
 I feel an ebb in my philosophy,
 And the tide rising in my alter'd eye.

X.

I did remind thee of our own dear Lake*,
 By the old Hall which may be mine no more.
 Leman's is fair; but think not I forsake
 The sweet remembrance of a dearer shore:
 Sad havoc Time must with my memory make
 Ere that or thou can fade these eyes before:
 Though, like all things which I have loved,
 they are
 Resign'd for ever, or divided far.

XI.

The world is all before me; I but ask
 Of Nature that with which she will comply—
 It is but in her summer's sun to bask,
 To mingle with the quiet of her sky,
 To see her gentle face without a mask,
 And never gaze on it with apathy.
 She was my early friend, and now shall be
 My sister—till I look again on thee.

XII.

I can reduce all feelings but this one;
 And that I would not;—for at length I see
 Such scenes as those wherein my life begun.

* The Lake of Newstead Abbey. [Thus described in Don Juan:—

"Before the mansion lay a 'lucid lake,
 Broad as transparent, deep, and freshly fed
 By a river, which its soften'd way did take
 In currents through the calmer water spread
 Around: the wild fowl nestled in the brake
 And sedges, brooding in their liquid bed;
 The woods sloped downwards to its brink, and stood
 With their green faces fix'd upon the flood."—ibid.

The earliest—even the only paths for me—
Had I but sooner learnt the crowd to shun,
I had been better than I now can be;
The passions, which have torn me would have slept;

I had not suffer'd, and thou hadst not wept.

XIII.

With false ambition what had I to do?
Little with love, and least of all with fame;
And yet they came unsought, and with me
grew,
And made me all which they can make—a name.

Yet this was not the end I did pursue;
Surely I once beheld a nobler aim.
But all is over—I am one the more

To baffled millions which have gone before.

XIV.

And for the future, this world's future may
From me demand but little of my care;
I have outlived myself by many a day;
Having survived so many things that were;
My years have been no slumber, but the prey
Of ceaseless vigils; for I had the share
Of life which might have fill'd a century,
Before its fourth in time had pass'd me by.

XV.

And for the remnant which may be to come
I am content; and for the past I feel
Not thankless,—for within the crowded sum
Of struggles, happiness at times would steal,
And for the present, I would not benumb
My feelings farther.—Nor shall I conceal
That with all this I still can look around
And worship Nature with a thought profound.

XVI.

For thee, my own sweet sister, in thy heart
I know myself secure, as thou in mine;
We were and are—I am, even as thou art—
Beings who ne'er each other can resign;
It is the same, together or apart,
From life's commencement to its slow decline
We are entwined—let death come slow or fast,
The tie which bound the first endures the last!

STANZAS.

One struggle more, and I am free
From pangs that rend my heart in twain;
One last long sigh to love and thee,
Then back to busy life again.
It suits me well to mingle now
With things that never pleased before:
Though every joy is fled below,
What future grief can touch me more?

Then bring me wine, the banquet bring;
Man was not form'd to live alone:
I'll be that light, unmeaning thing
That smiles with all, and weeps with none.

It was not thus in days more dear,
It never would have been, but thou
Hast fled, and left me lonely here;
Thou'rt nothing,—all are nothing now.

In vain my lyre would lightly breathe!
The smile that sorrow fain would wear
But mocks the woe that lurks beneath,
Like roses o'er a sepulchre.
Though gay companions o'er the bowl
Dispel awhile the sense of ill;
Though pleasure fires the maddening soul,
The heart—the heart is lonely still!

On many a lone and lovely night
It sooth'd to gaze upon the sky;
For then I deem'd the heavenly light
Shone sweetly on thy pensive eye:
And oft I thought at Cynthia's noon,
When sailing o'er the Ægean wave,
"Now Thyra gazes on that moon—"
Alas, it gleam'd upon her grave!

When stretch'd on fever's sleepless bed,
And sickness shrunk my throbbing veins,
"Tis comfort still," I faintly said,
"That Thyra cannot know my pains:"
Like freedom to the time-worn slave,
A boon 'tis idle then to give,
Relenting Nature vainly gave
My life, when Thyra ceased to live!

My Thyra's pledge in better days,
When love and life alike were new!
How different now thou meet'st my gaze!
How tinged by time with sorrow's hue!
The heart that gave itself with thee
Is silent—ah, were mine as still!
Though cold as e'en the dead can be,
It feels, it sickens with the chill.

Thou bitter pledge! thou mournful token!
Though painful, welcome to my breast!
Still, still, preserve that love unbroken,
Or break the heart to which thou'rt press'd!
Time tempers love, but not removes,
More hallow'd when its hope is fled:
Oh! what are thousand living loves
To that which cannot quit the dead?

GREECE.

[From the Glaour.]

He who hath bent him o'er the dead
Ere the first day of death is fled,
The first dark day of nothingness,
The last of danger and distress,
(Before decay's effacing fingers
Have swept the lines where beauty lingers,)
And mark'd the mild angelic air,
The rapture of repose that's there,
The fix'd yet tender traits that streak
The languor of the placid cheek,
And—but for that sad shrouded eye,

That fires not, wins not, weeps not, now,
 And but for that chill, changeless brow,
 Where cold obstruction's apathy*
 Appals the gazing mourner's heart,
 As if to him it could impart
 The doom he dreads, yet dwells upon ;
 Yes, but for these and these alone,
 Some moments, ay, one treacherous hour,
 He still might doubt the tyrant's power ;
 So fair, so calm, so softly seal'd,
 The first, last look by death reveal'd !
 Such is the aspect of this shore ;
 'Tis Greece, but living Greece no more !
 So coldly sweet, so deadly fair,
 We start, for soul is wanting there.
 Hers is the loveliness in death,
 That parts not quite with parting breath ;
 But beauty with that fearful bloom,
 That hue which haunts it to the tomb,
 Expression's last receding ray,
 A gilded halo hovering round decay,
 The farewell beam of feeling past away !
 Spark of that flame, perchance of heavenly birth,
 Which gleams, but warms no more its cherish'd earth !

JULIA'S FAREWELL LETTER TO DON JUAN.

[Don Juan, Canto I.]

THEY tell me 'tis decided ; you depart :
 'Tis wise—'t is well, but not the less a pain ;
 I have no further claim on your young heart,
 Mine is the victim, and would be again ;
 To love too much has been the only art
 I used ; I write in haste, and if a stain
 Be on this sheet, 't is not what it appears ;
 My eyeballs burn and throb, but have no tears.
 I loved, I love you, for this love have lost
 State, station, heaven, mankind's, my own esteem,
 And yet can not regret what it hath cost,
 So dear is still the memory of that dream ;
 Yet, if I name my guilt, 'tis not to boast,
 None can deem harshlier of me than I deem :
 I trace this scrawl because I cannot rest—
 I've nothing to reproach, or to request.

Man's love is of man's life a thing apart,
 'Tis woman's whole existence : man may range
 The court, camp, church, the vessel, and the mart,
 Sword, gown, gain, glory, offer in exchange
 Pride, fame, ambition, to fill up his heart,
 And few there are whom these can not estrange ;
 Men have all these resources, we but one,
 To love again, and be again undone.

* " Ay, but to die and go we know not where,
 To live in cold obstruction !"

Measure for Measure.

You will proceed in pleasure, and in pride,
 Beloved and loving many ; all is o'er
 For me on earth, except some years to hide
 My shame and sorrow deep in my heart's core ;
 These I could bear, but cannot cast aside
 The passion which still rages as before,—
 And so farewell—forgive me, love me—No,
 That word is idle now—but let it go.

My breast has been all weakness, is so yet ;
 But still I think I can collect my mind ;
 My blood still rushes where my spirit's set.
 As roll the waves before the settled wind ;
 My heart is feminine, nor can forget—
 To all, except one image, madly blind ;
 So shakes the needle, and so stands the pole,
 As vibrates my fond heart to my fix'd soul.

I have no more to say, but linger still,
 And dare not set my seal upon this sheet,
 And yet I may as well the task fulfil,
 My misery can scarce be more complete :
 I had not lived till now, could sorrow kill ;
 Death shuns the wretch who fain the blow
 would meet,
 And I must even survive this last adieu,
 And bear with life, to love and pray for you !

THE SHIPWRECK.

[Don Juan, Canto II.]

'Twas twilight, and the sunless day went down
 Over the waste of waters ; like a veil,
 Which, if withdrawn, would but disclose the frown

Of one whose hate is mask'd but to assail,
 Thus to their hopeless eyes the night was shown
 And grimly darkled o'er their faces pale,
 And the dim desolate deep : twelve days had Fear
 Been their familiar, and now Death was here.

Some trial had been making at a raft,
 With little hope in such a rolling sea,
 A sort of thing at which one would have laugh'd,
 If any laughter at such times could be,
 Unless with people who too much have quaff'd,
 And have a kind of wild and horrid glee,
 Half epileptical, and half hysterical :—
 Their preservation would have been a miracle.

At half-past eight o'clock, booms, hencoops,
 spars,
 And all things, for a chance, had been cast
 loose,
 That still could keep afloat the struggling tars,
 For yet they strove, although of no great use :
 There was no light in heaven but a few stars,
 The boats put off o'ercrowded with their crews ;

She gave a heel, and then a lurch to port,
And, going down head foremost—sunk, in short.

Then rose from sea to sky the wild farewell—
Then shriek'd the timid, and stood still the brave—

Then some leap'd overboard with dreadful yell,
As eager to anticipate their grave ;

And the sea yawn'd around her like a hell,
And down she suck'd with her the whirling
wave,

Like one who grapples with his enemy,
And strives to strangle him before he die.

And first one universal shriek there rush'd
Louder than the loud ocean, like a crash
Of echoing thunder ; and then all was hush'd,
Save the wild wind and the remorseless dash
Of billows ; but at intervals there gush'd,
Accompanied with a convulsive splash,
A solitary shriek, the bubbling cry
Of some strong swimmer in his agony.

The boats, as stated, had got off before,
And in them crowded several of the crew ;
And yet their present hope was hardly more
Than what it had been, for so strong it blew
There was slight chance of reaching any shore ;
And then they were too many, though so few

Nine in the cutter, thirty in the boat,
Were counted in them when they got afloat.

Juan got into the long-boat, and there
Contrived to help Pedrillo to a place ;
It seem'd as if they had exchanged their care,
For Juan wore the magisterial face
Which courage gives, while poor Pedrillo's pair
Of eyes were crying for their owner's care ;
Battista, though, (a name call'd shortly Tita)
Was lost by getting at some aqua-vita.

Pedro, his valet, too, he tried to save,
But the same cause, conducive to his loss,
Left him so drunk, he jump'd into the wave
As o'er the cutter's edge he tried to cross,
And so he found a wine-and-watery grave ;
They could not rescue him although so close,
Because the sea ran higher every minute,
And for the boat—the crew kept crowding in it.

A small old spaniel,—which had been Don José's,

His father's, whom he loved, as ye may think,
For on such things the memory reposes

With tenderness—stood howling on the brink,
Knowing, (dogs have such intellectual noses !)

No doubt, the vessel was about to sink ;
And Juan caught him up, and ere he stepp'd
Off, threw him in, then after him he leap'd.

4 E 2

He also stuff'd his money where he could
About his person, and Pedrillo's too,
Who let him do, in fact, whate'er he would,
Not knowing what himself to say, or do,
As every rising wave his dread renew'd ;
But Juan, trusting they might still get through
And deeming there were remedies for any ill,
Thus re-embarked his tutor and his spaniel.

'Twas a rough night, and blew so stiffly yet,
That the sail was becalm'd between the seas,
Though on the wave's high top too much to set,
They dared not take it in for all the breeze :
Each sea curl'd o'er the stern, and kept them
wet,

And made them bale without a moment's ease,
So that themselves as well as hopes were damp'd,
And the poor little cutter quickly swamp'd.

Nine souls more went in her ; the long-boat
still

Kept above water, with an oar for mast,
Two blankets stitch'd together, answering ill
Instead of sail, were to the oar made fast :
Though every wave roll'd menacing to fill,
And present peril all before surpass'd,
They grieved for those who perish'd with the cutter,
And also for the biscuit-casks and butter.

The sun rose red and fiery, a sure sign
Of the continuance of the gale : to run
Before the sea until it should grow fine,
Was all that for the present could be done :
A few tea-spoonfuls of their rum and wine
Were served out to the people, who begun
To faint, and damaged bread wet through the bags,
And most of them had little clothes but rags.

They counted thirty, crowded in a space
Which left scarce room for motion or exertion ;
They did their best to modify their case,
One half sate up, though numb'd with the immersion,
While t'other half were laid down in their place,
At watch and watch ; thus, shivering like the tertian
Ague in its cold fit, they fill'd their boat,
With nothing but the sky for a great coat.

'Tis very certain the desire of life
Prolongs it : this is obvious to physicians,
When patients, neither plagued with friends
nor wife,
Survive through very desperate conditions,
Because they still can hope, nor shines the knife

Nor shears of Atropos before their visions :
Despair of all recovery spoils longevity,
And makes men's miseries of alarming brevity.

'Tis said that persons living on annuities
Are longer lived than others,—God knows why,
Unless to plague the grantors,—yet so true it is,
That some, I really think, do never die ;
Of any creditors the worst a Jew it is,
And that's their mode of furnishing supply :
In my young days they lent me cash that way,
Which I found very troublesome to pay.

'Tis thus with people in an open boat ;
They live upon the love of life, and bear
More than can be believed, or even thought,
And stand like rocks the tempest's wear and tear ;
And hardship still has been the sailor's lot,
Since Noah's ark went cruising here and there ;
She had a curious crew as well as cargo.
Like the first old Greek privateer, the Argo.

But man is a carnivorous production,
And must have meals, at least one meal a day ;
He cannot live, like woodcocks, upon suction,
But, like the shark and tiger, must have prey ;
Although his anatomical construction
Bears vegetables, in a grumbling way,
Your labouring people think beyond all question,
Beef, veal and mutton, better for digestion.

And thus it was with this our hapless crew ;
For on the third day there came on a calm,
And though at first their strength it might renew,
And lying on their weariness like balm,
Lull'd them like turtles sleeping on the blue
Of ocean, when they woke they felt a qualm,
And fell all ravenously on their provision,
Instead of hoarding it with due precision.

The consequence was easily foreseen— [wine,
They ate up all they had, and drank their
In spite of all remonstrances, and then
On what, in fact, next day were they to dine ?
They hoped the wind would rise, these foolish men ! [fine,
And carry them to shore ; these hopes were
But as they had but one oar, and that brittle,
It would have been more wise to save their vic-
tual.

The fourth day came, but not a breath of air,
And Ocean slumber'd like an unwean'd child ;
The fifth day, and their boat lay floating there,
The sea and sky were blue, and clear, and mild—
With their one oar (I wish they had had a pair)
What could they do ? and hunger's rage grew wild :
So Juan's spaniel, spite of his entreating,
Was kill'd, and portion'd out for present eating.

On the sixth day they fed upon his hide,
And Juan, who had still refused, because
The creature was his father's dog that died,
Now feeling all the vulture in his jaws,

With some remorse received (though first denied)
As a great favour one of the fore-paws,
Which he divided with Pedrillo, who
Devour'd it, longing for the other too.

The seventh day, and no wind—the burning sun
Blister'd and scorch'd, and, stagnant on the sea,
They lay like carcasses ; and hope was none,
Save in the breeze that came not : savagely
They glared upon each other—all was done,
Water, and wine, and food,—and you might see
The longings of the cannibal arise
(Although they spoke not) in their wolfish eyes.

At length one whisper'd his companion, who
Whisper'd another, and thus it went round,
And then into a hoarser murmur grew,
An ominous, and wild, and desperate sound ;
And when his comrade's thought each sufferer
knew ;
'Twas but his own, suppress'd till now, he found :
And out they spoke of lots for flesh and blood,
And who should die to be his fellow's food.

But ere they came to this, they that day shared
Some leathern caps, and what remain'd of shoes ;
And then they look'd around them, and despair'd,
And none to be the sacrifice would choose ;
At length the lots were torn up and prepared
But of materials that much shook the Muse—
Having no paper, for the want of better,
They took by force from Juan Julia's letter.

The lots were made, and mark'd, and mix'd, and handed,
In silent horror, and their distribution
Lull'd even the savage hunger which demanded,
Like the Promethean vulture, this pollution :
None in particular had sought or plann'd it,
'Twas nature gnaw'd them to this resolution,
By which none were permitted to be neuter—
And the lot fell on Juan's luckless tutor.

He but requested to be bled to death :
The surgeon had his instruments, and bled
Pedrillo, and so gently ebb'd his breath,
You hardly could perceive when he was dead.
He died as born, a Catholic in faith,
Like most in the belief in which they're bred,
And first a little crucifix he kiss'd,
And then held out his jugular and wrist.

The surgeon, as there was no other fee,
Had his first choice of morsels for his pains :
But being thirstiest at the moment, he Preferr'd a draught from the fast flowing veins :

Part was divided, part thrown in the sea,
 And such things as the entrails and the brains
 Regaled two sharks, who follow'd o'er the billow—
 The sailors ate, the rest of poor Pedrillo.

The sailors ate him, all save three or four,
 Who were not quite so fond of animal food ;
 To these was added Juan, who, before
 Refusing his own spaniel, hardly could Feel now his appetite increased much more ;
 'Twas not to be expected that he should,
 Even in extremity of their disaster,
 Dine with them on his pastor and his master.

'T was better that he did not ; for, in fact,
 The consequence was awful in the extreme ;
 For they, who were most ravenous in the act,
 Went raging mad—Lord ! how they did blaspheme !
 And foam and roll, with strange convulsions rack'd
 Drinking salt-water like a mountain-stream,
 Tearing and grinning, howling, screeching, swear-
 ing,
 And, with hyæna-laughter, died despairing.

Their numbers were much thinn'd by this infic-
 tion, [knows ;
 And all the rest were thin enough, Heaven
 And some of them had lost their recollection,
 Happier than they who still perceived their woes ;
 But others ponder'd on a new dissection,
 As if not warn'd sufficiently by those
 Who had already perish'd, suffering madly,
 For having used their appetites so sadly.

Of poor Pedrillo something still remain'd,
 But was used sparingly,—some were afraid,
 And others still their appetites constrain'd,
 Or but at times a little supper made ;
 All except Juan, who throughout abstain'd,
 Chewing a piece of bamboo, and some lead :
 At length they caught two boobies, and a nod-
 dy,
 And then they left off eating the dead body.

And if Pedrillo's fate should shocking be,
 Remember Ugolino condescends
 To eat the head of his arch-enemy
 The moment after he politely ends
 His tale : if foes be food in hell, at sea
 'Tis surely fair to dine upon our friends,
 When shipwreck's short allowance grows too
 scanty,
 Without being much more horrible than Dante.

And the same night there fell a shower of rain,
 For which their mouths gaped, like the cracks of earth
 When dried to summer dust ; till taught by pain
 Men really know not what good water's worth :

If you had been in Turkey or in Spain,
 Or with a famish'd boat's-crew had your berth,
 Or in the desert heard the camel's bell,
 You'd wish yourself where Truth is—in a well.

It pour'd down torrents, but they were no richer
 Until they found a ragged piece of sheet,
 Which served them as a sort of spongy pitcher,
 And when they deem'd its moisture was complete,
 They wrung it out, and though a thirsty ditch-
 er
 Might not have thought the scanty draught
 so sweet
 As a full pot of porter, to their thinking
 They ne'er till now had known the joys of drinking.

There were two fathers in this ghastly crew,
 And with them their two sons, of whom the one
 Was more robust and hardy to the view,
 But he died early ; and when he was gone,
 His nearest messmate told his sire, who threw
 One glance on him, and said, " Heaven's will be done !
 I can do nothing," and he saw him thrown
 Into the deep without a tear or groan.

The other father had a weaklier child,
 Of a soft cheek, and aspect delicate ;
 But the boy bore up long, and with a mild
 And patient spirit held aloof his fate ;
 Little he said, and now and then he smiled,
 As if to win a part from off the weight
 He saw increasing on his father's heart,
 With the deep deadly thought, that they must part.

And o'er him bent his sire, and never raised
 His eyes from off his face, but wiped the foam
 From his pale lips, and ever on him gazed,
 And when the wish'd-for shower at length
 was come,
 And the boy's eyes, which the dull film half glazed,
 Brighten'd, and for a moment seem'd to roam,
 He squeezed from out a rag some drops of rain
 Into his dying child's mouth—but in vain.

The boy expired—the father held the clay,
 And look'd upon it long, and when at last
 Death left no doubt, and the dead burthen lay Stiff on his heart, and pulse and hope were past,
 He watch'd it wistfully, until away
 'Twas borne by the rude wave wherein 'twas cast ;
 Then he himself sunk down all dumb and shivering,
 And gave no sign of life, save his limbs quiver-
 ing.

Now overhead a rainbow, bursting through
 The scattering clouds, shone, spanning the dark sea,
 Resting its bright base on the quivering blue ;
 ' And all within its arch appear'd to be
 Clearer than that without, and its wide hue
 Wax'd broad and waving, like a banner free,
 Then changed like to a bow that's bent, and then
 Forsook the dim eyes of these shipwreck'd men.

It changed, of course ; a heavenly cameleon,
 The airy child of vapour and the sun,
 Brought forth in purple, cradled in vermilion,
 Baptized in molten gold, and swathed in dun,
 Glittering like crescents o'er a Turk's pavilion,
 And blending every colour into one,
 Just like a black eye in a recent scuffle
 (For sometimes we must box without the muffle).

Our shipwreck'd seamen thought it a good omen—

It is as well to think so, now and then ;
 'Tas an old custom of the Greek and Roman,
 And may become of great advantage when
 Folks are discouraged ; and most surely no men
 Had greater need to nerve themselves again
 Than these, and so this rainbow look'd like hope—
 Quite a celestial kaleidoscope.

About this time a beautiful white bird,
 Webfooted, not unlike a dove in size
 And plumage (probably it might have err'd
 Upon its course) pass'd oft before their eyes,
 And tried to perch, although it saw and heard
 The men within the boat, and in this guise
 It came and went, and flutter'd round them till Night fell :—this seem'd a better omen still.

But in this case I also must remark,
 'Twas well this bird of promise did not perch,
 Because the tackle of our shatter'd bark
 Was not so safe for roosting as a church ;
 And had it been the dove from Noah's ark,
 Returning there from her successful search,
 Which in their way that moment chanced to fall,
 They would have eat her, olive-branch and all.

With twilight it again came on to blow,
 But not with violence ; the stars shone out,
 The boat made way ; yet now they were so low,
 They knew not where nor what they were about ;
 Some fancied they saw land, and some said
 " No !"
 The frequent fog-banks gave them cause to doubt—
 Some swore that, they heard breakers, others guns,
 And all mistook about the latter once.

As morning broke, the light wind died away,
 When he who had the watch sung out and swore,

If 't was not land that rose with the sun's ray,
 He wish'd that land he never might see more ;
 And the rest rubb'd their eyes, and saw a bay,
 Or thought they saw, and shaped their course
 for shore :

For shore it was, and gradually grew
 Distinct, and high, and palpable to view.

And then of these some part burst into tears,
 And others, looking with a stupid stare,
 Could not yet separate their hopes from fears,
 And seem'd as if they had no further care ;
 While a few pray'd—(the first time for some years)—
 And at the bottom of the boat three were Asleep : they shook them by the hand and head,
 And tried to awaken them, but found them dead.

The day before, fast sleeping on the water,
 They found a turtle of the hawk's-bill kind,
 And by good fortune, gliding softly, caught her,
 Which yielded a day's life, and to their mind
 Proved even still a more nutritious matter,
 Because it left encouragement behind :
 They thought that in such perils, more than chance
 Had sent them this for their deliverance.

The land appear'd a high and rocky coast,
 And higher grew the mountains as they drew,
 Set by a current, toward it : they were lost
 In various conjectures, for none knew
 To what part of the earth they had been tost,
 So changeable had been the winds that blew ;
 Some thought it was Mount Ætna, some the highlands
 Of Candia, Cyprus, Rhodes, or other islands.

Meantime the current, with a rising gale,
 Still set them onwards to the welcome shore,
 Like Charon's bark of spectres, dull and pale :
 Their living freight was now reduced to four,
 And three dead, whom their strength could not avail
 To heave into the deep with those before,
 Though the two sharks still follow'd them, and dash'd
 The spray into their faces as they splash'd.

Famine, despair, cold, thirst, and heat, had done
 Their work on them by turns, and thinn'd them to
 Such things a mother had not known her son
 Amidst the skeletons of that gaunt crew ;
 By night chill'd, by day scorch'd, thus one by one
 They perish'd, until wither'd to these few,
 But chiefly by a species of self-slaughter,
 In washing down Pedrillo with salt water :

As they drew nigh the land, which now was seen
 Unequal in its aspect here and there,

They felt the freshness of its growing green,
That waved in forest-tops, and smooth'd the air.

And fell upon their glazed eyes like a screen
From glistening waves, and skies so hot and bare—

Lovely seem'd any object that should sweep
Away the vast, salt, dread, eternal deep.

The shore look'd wild, without a trace of man,
And girt by formidable waves; but they Were mad for land, and thus their course they ran,

Though right ahead the roaring breakers lay:
A reef between them also now began

To show its boiling surf and bounding spray,
But finding no place for their landing better,
They ran the boat for shore,—and overset her.

But in his native stream, the Guadalquivir,
Juan to lave his youthful limbs was wont;
And having learnt to swim in that sweet river,
Had often turn'd the art to some account:
A better swimmer you could scarce see ever,
He could, perhaps, have pass'd the Hellespont,

As once (a feat on which ourselves we prided)
Leander, Mr. Ekenhead, and I did.

So here, though faint, emaciated, and stark,
He buoy'd his boyish limbs, and strove to ply
With the quick wave, and gain, ere it was dark,
The beach which lay before him, high and dry;
The greatest danger here was from a shark,
That carried off his neighbour by the thigh;
As for the other two, they could not swim,
So nobody arrived on shore but him.

Nor yet had he arrived but for the oar,
Which, providentially for him, was wash'd
Just as his feeble arms could strike no more,
And the hard wave o'erwhelm'd him as 'twas
dash'd

Within his grasp; he clung to it, and sore
The waters beat while he thereto was lash'd;
At last, with swimming, wading, scrambling, he
Roll'd on the beach, half senseless, from the sea:

There, breathless, with his digging nails he clung

Fast to the sand, lest the returning wave,
From whose reluctant roar his life he wrung,
Should suck him back to her insatiate grave:
And there he lay, full length, where he was flung,

Before the entrance of a cliff-worn cave,
With just enough of life to feel its pain,
And deem that it was saved, perhaps, in vain.

With slow and staggering effort he arose,
But sunk again upon his bleeding knee
And quivering hand; and then he look'd for those

Who long had been his mates upon the sea;

But none of them appear'd to share his woes,
Save one, a corpse from out the famish'd three,
Who died two days before, and now had found
An unknown barren beach for burial ground.

And as he gazed, his dizzy brain spun fast,
And down he sunk; and as he sunk, the sand
Swam round and round, and all his senses pass'd:
He fell upon his side, and his stretch'd hand
Droop'd dripping on the oar (their jury-mast),
And, like a wither'd lily, on the land
His slender frame and pallid aspect lay,
As fair a thing as e'er was form'd of clay.

How long in his damp trance young Juan lay
He knew not, for the earth was gone for him,
And Time had nothing more of night nor day
For his congealing blood, and senses dim;
And how this heavy faintness pass'd away
He knew not, till each painful pulse and limb,
And tingling vein, seem'd throbbing back to life,
For Death, though vanquish'd, still retired with strife.

His eyes he open'd, shut, again unclosed,
For all was doubt and dizziness; he thought
He still was in the boat, and had but dozed,
And felt again with his despair o'erwrought,
And wish'd it death in which he had reposed,
And then once more his feelings back were brought,
And slowly by his swimming eyes was seen
A lovely female face of seventeen.

'T was bending close o'er his, and the small mouth
Seem'd almost prying into his for breath;
And chafing him, the soft warm hand of youth
Recall'd his answering spirits back from death;
And, bathing his chill temples, tried to soothe
Each pulse to animation, till beneath
Its gentle touch and trembling care, a sigh
To these kind efforts made a low reply.

Then was the cordial pour'd, and mantle flung
Around his scarce-clad limbs; and the fair arm
Raised higher the faint head which o'er it hung;
And her transparent cheek, all pure and warm,
Pillow'd his death-like forehead; then she wrung
His dewy curls, long drench'd by every storm;
And watch'd with eagerness each throb that drew
A sigh from his heaved bosom—and hers, too.

And lifting him with care into the cave,
The gentle girl, and her attendant,—one
Young, yet her elder, and of brow less grave,
And more robust of figure,—then begun
To kindle fire, and as the new flames gave Light to the rocks that roof'd them, which the sun
Had never seen, the maid, or whatso'er
She was, appear'd distinct, and tall, and fair.

Her brow was overhung with coins of gold,
That sparkled o'er the auburn of her hair,
Her clustering hair, whose longer locks were roll'd

In braids behind ; and though her stature were Even of the highest for a female mould,

They nearly reach'd her heel ; and in her air
There was a something which bespoke command,
As one who was a lady in the land.

Her hair, I said, was auburn ; but her eyes
Were black as death, their lashes the same hue,

Of downcast length, in whose silk shadow lies
Deepest attraction : for when to the view
Forth from its raven fringe the full glance flies,
Ne'er with such force the swiftest arrow flew ;
'Tis as the snake late coil'd, who pours his length,
And hurls at once his venom and his strength.

Her brow was white and low, her cheek's pure dye

Like twilight rosy still with the set sun ;
Short upper lip—sweet lips ! that make us sigh
Ever to have seen such ; for she was one
Fit for the model of a statuary,

(A race of mere impostors, when all's done—
I've seen much finer women, ripe and real,
Than all the nonsense of their stone ideal).

I'll tell you why I say so, for 't is just

One should not rail without a decent cause :
'There was an Irish lady, to whose bust

I ne'er saw justice done, and yet she was
A frequent model ; and if e'er she must [laws,
Yield to stern Time and Nature's wrinkling
They will destroy a face which mortal thought
Ne'er compass'd, nor less mortal chisel wrought.

And such was she, the lady of the cave :

Her dress was very different from the Spanish,
Simpler, and yet of colours not so grave :

For, as you know, the Spanish women banish Bright hues when out of doors, and yet, while wave

Around them (what I hope will never vanish)
'The basquina and the mantilla, they Seem at the same time mystical and gay.

But with our damsel this was not the case :

Her dress was many-colour'd, finely spun ;
Her locks curl'd negligently round her face,

But through them gold and gems profusely
shone :

Her girdle sparkled, and the richest lace

Flow'd in her veil, and many a precious stone
Flash'd on her little hand ; but, what was shocking, [ing,

Her small snow feet had slippers, but no stock-

'The other female's dress was not unlike,

But of inferior materials : she

'Had not so many ornaments to strike,

Her hair had silver only, bound to be

Her dowry ; and her veil, in form alike, [free ;
Was coarser ; and her air, though firm, less
Her hair was thicker, but less long ; her eyes
As black, but quicker, and of smaller size.

And these two tended him, and cheer'd him
both [tions,

With food and raiment, and those soft atten-
Which are—(as I must own)—of female growth,
And have ten thousand delicate inventions :

They made a most superior mess of broth,
A thing which poesy but seldom mentions,
But the best dish that e'er was cook'd since Homer's

Achilles order'd dinner for new comers.

I'll tell you who they were, this female pair,

Lest they should seem princesses in disguise ;
Besides, I hate all mystery, and that air

Of clap-trap, which your recent poets prize ;
And so, in short, the girls they really were

They shall appear before your curious eyes,
Mistress and maid ; the first was only daughter
Of an old man, who lived upon the water.

A fisherman he had been in his youth,
And still a sort of fisherman was he ;
But other speculations were, in sooth,

Added to his connection with the sea,
Perhaps not so respectable, in truth :

A little smuggling, and some piracy,
Left him, at last, the sole of many masters
Of an ill-gotten million of piastres,

He was a Greek, and on his isle had built
(One of the wild and smaller Cyclades)

A very handsome house from out his guilt,
And there he lived exceedingly at ease ;

Heaven knows, what cash he got or blood he spilt,

A sad old fellow was he, if you please ;
But this I know, it was a spacious building,
Full of barbaric carving, paint, and gilding.

He had an only daughter, call'd Haidée,

The greatest heiress of the Eastern Isles ;
Besides, so very beautiful was she,

Her dowry was as nothing to her smiles :
Still in her teens, and like a lovely tree

She grew to womanhood, and between whiles
Rejected several suitors, just to learn
How to accept a better in his turn.

And walking out upon the beach, below

The cliff, towards sunset, on that day she found,

Insensible,—not dead, but nearly so,—

Don Juan, almost famish'd, and half drown'd ;
But being naked, she was shock'd, you know,

Yet deem'd herself in common pity bound,

As far as in her lay, "to take him in,
A stranger" dying, with so white a skin.

* * * * *

They made a fire,—but such a fire as they Upon the moment could contrive with such Materials as were cast up round the bay,—
 Some broken planks, and oars, that to the touch
 Were nearly tinder, since so long they lay
 A mast was almost crumbled to a crutch ;
 But, by God's grace, here wrecks were in such plenty,
 That there was fuel to have furnish'd twenty.

He had a bed of furs, and a pelisse,
 For Haidée stripp'd her sables off to make
 His couch ; and, that he might be more at ease,
 And warm, in case by chance he should awake,
 They also gave a petticoat apiece,
 She and her maid,—and promised by daybreak
 To pay him a fresh visit, with a dish
 For breakfast, of eggs, coffee, bread, and fish.

And thus they left him to his lone repose :
 Juan slept like a top, or like the dead,
 Who sleep at last, perhaps (God only knows),
 Just for the present ; and in his lull'd head
 Not even a vision of his former woes Throb'd in accursed dreams, which sometimes spread
 Unwelcome visions of our former years,
 Till the eye, cheated, opens thick with tears.

Young Juan slept all dreamless :—but the maid,
 Who smooth'd his pillow, as she left the den
 Look'd back upon him, and a moment stay'd,
 And turn'd, believing that he call'd again.
 He slumber'd ; yet she thought, at least she said
 (The heart will slip, even as the tongue and pen),
 He had pronounced her name—but she forgot
 That at this moment Juan knew it not.

And pensive to her father's house she went,
 Enjoining silence strict to Zoe, who
 Better than her knew what, in fact, she meant,
 She being wiser by a year or two :
 A year or two's an age when rightly spent,
 And Zoe spent hers, as most women do,
 In gaining all that useful sort of knowledge
 Which is acquired in Nature's good old college.

The morn broke, and found Juan slumbering still Fast in his cave, and nothing clash'd upon
 His rest ; the rushing of the neighbouring rill,
 And the young beams of the excluded sun,
 Troubled him not, and he might sleep his fill ;
 And need he had of slumber yet, for none
 Had suffer'd more—his hardships were comparative
 To those related in my grand-dad's "Narrative*."

* Entitled "A Narrative of the Honourable John Byron (Commodore in a late expedition round the world) containing an account of the great distresses suffered by himself and his companions on the coast of Patagonia, from the year 1790, till their

Not so Haidée : she sadly toss'd and tumbled,
 And started from her sleep, and, turning o'er,
 Dream'd of a thousand wrecks, o'er which she stumbled,
 And handsome corpses strew'd upon the shore ;
 And woke her maid so early that she grumbled,
 And call'd her father's old slaves up, who swore
 In several oaths—Armenian, Turk, and Greek—
 They knew not what to think of such a freak.

I say, the sun is a most glorious sight,
 I've seen him rise full oft, indeed of late
 I have sat up on purpose all the night,
 Which hastens, as physicians say, one's fate ;
 And so all ye, who would be in the right
 In health and purse, begin your day to date
 From daybreak, and when coffin'd at fourscore,
 Engrave upon the plate, you rose at four.

And Haidée met the morning face to face ;
 Her own was freshest, though a feverish flush
 Had dyed it with the headlong blood, whose race
 From heart to cheek is curb'd into a blush,
 Like to a torrent which a mountain's base,
 That overpowers some Alpine river's rush,
 Checks to a lake, whose waves in circles spread ;
 Or the Red Sea—but the sea is not red.

And down the cliff the island virgin came,
 And near the cave her quick light footsteps
 drew,
 While the sun smiled on her with his first flame,
 And young Aurora kiss'd her lips with dew,
 Taking her for a sister ; just the same [two,
 Mistake you would have made on seeing the
 Although the mortal, quite as fresh and fair,
 Had all the advantage, too, of not being air.

And when into the cavern Haidée stepp'd
 All timidly, yet rapidly, she saw
 That like an infant Juan sweetly slept ;
 And then she stopp'd, and stood as if in awe
 (For sleep is awful), and on tiptoe crept
 And wrapt him closer, lest the air, too raw,
 Should reach his blood, then o'er him still as death
 Bent, with hush'd lips, that drank his scarcedrawn breath.

And thus like to an angel o'er the dying
 Who die in righteousness, she lean'd ; and
 there
 All tranquilly the shipwreck'd boy was lying,
 As o'er him lay the calm and stirless air :
 But Zoe the meantime some eggs was frying,
 Since, after all, no doubt the youthful pair
 Must breakfast, and betimes—lest they should ask it,
 She drew out her provision from the basket.

arrival in England, 1746 ; written by himself." This narrative, one of the most interesting that ever appeared, was published in 1768.

She knew that the best feelings must have vic-
tual,

And that a shipwreck'd youth would hungry
be ;

Besides, being less in love, she yawn'd a little,
And felt her veins chill'd by the neighbouring
sea ;

And so, she cook'd their breakfast to a tittle ;
I can't say that she gave them any tea,
But there were eggs, fruit, coffee, bread, fish,
honey,
With Scio wine,—and all for love, not money.

And Zoe, when the eggs were ready, and
The coffee made, would fain have waken'd
Juan ;
But Haidée stopp'd her with her quick small
hand,

And without word, a sign her finger drew on
Her lip, which Zoe needs must understand ;
And, the first breakfast spoilt, prepared a new one,

Because her mistress would not let her break
That sleep which seem'd as it would ne'er awake.

For still he lay, and on his thin worn cheek
A purple hectic play'd like dying day
On the snow-tops of distant hills ; the streak
Of sufferance yet upon his forehead lay.
Where the blue veins look'd shadowy, shrunk,
and weak ;
And his black curls were dewy with the spray.
Which weigh'd upon them yet, all damp and salt,
Mix'd with the stony vapours of the vault.

And she bent o'er him, and he lay beneath,
Hush'd as the babe upon its mother's breast,
Droop'd as the willow when no winds can breathe,
Lull'd like the depth of ocean when at rest,
Fair as the crowning rose of the whole wreath,
Soft as the callow cygnet in its nest ;
In short, he was a very pretty fellow,
Although his woes had turn'd him rather yellow.

He woke and gazed, and would have slept again,
But the fair face which met his eyes forbade
Those eyes to close, though weariness and pain
Had further sleep a further pleasure made ;
For woman's face was never form'd in vain
For Juan, so that even when he pray'd
He turn'd from grisly saints, and martyrs hairy,
To the sweet portraits of the Virgin Mary.

And thus upon his elbow he arose,
And look'd upon the lady, in whose cheek
The pale contended with the purple rose,
As with an effort she began to speak :
Her eyes were eloquent, her words would pose,
Although she told him, in good modern Greek,
With an Ionian accent, low and sweet,
•That he was faint, and must not talk, but eat.

Now Juan could not understand a word,
Being no Grecian ; but he had an ear,
And her voice was the warble of a bird,
So soft, so sweet, so delicately clear,
That finer, simpler music ne'er was heard* ;
The sort of sound we echo with a tear,
Without knowing why—an overpowering tone,
Whence melody descends as from a throne.

And Jaun gazed as one who is awake
By a distant organ, doubting if he be
Not yet a dreamer, till the spell is broke
By the watchman, or some such reality,
Or by one's early valet's cursed knock ;
At least it is a heavy sound to me,
Who like a morning slumber—for the night
Shows stars and women in a better light.

And Juan, too, was help'd out from his dream,
Or sleep, or whatsoe'er it was, by feeling
A most prodigious appetite : the steam
Of Zoe's cookery no doubt was stealing
Upon his senses, and the kindling beam
Of the new fire, which Zoe kept up, kneeling,
To stir her viands, made him quite awake
And long for food, but chiefly a beef-steak.

But beef is rare within these oxless isles ;
Goat's flesh there is, no doubt, and kid, and mutton ;
And, when a holiday upon them smiles,
A joint upon their barbarous spits they put on :
But this occurs but seldom, between whiles,
For some of these are rocks with scarce a hut
on ;
Others are fair and fertile, among which
This, though not large, was one of the most rich.

He ate, and he was well supplied : and she,
Who watch'd him like a mother, would have fed
Him past all bounds, because she smiled to see
Such appetite in one she had deem'd dead :
But Zoe, being older than Haidée,
Knew (by tradition, for she ne'er had read)
That famish'd people must be slowly nurst,
And fed by spoonfuls, else they always burst.

And so she took the liberty to state,
Rather by deeds than words, because the case
Was urgent, that the gentleman, whose fate
Had made her mistress quit her bed to trace
The sea-shore at this hour, must leave his plate,
Unless he wish'd to die upon the place—
She snatch'd it, and refused another morsel,
Saying, he had gorged enough to make a horse ill.

Next they—he being naked, save a tatter'd
Pair of scarce decent trowsers—went to work
And in the fire his recent rags they scatter'd,

* MS.—“ That finer melody was never heard,
The kind of sound whose echo is a tear,
Whose accents are the steps of Music's throne.

And dress'd him, for the present, like a Turk,
Or Greek—that is, although it not much mat-
ter'd,

Omitting turban, slippers, pistols, dirk,—
They furnish'd him, entire, except some stitches,
With a clean shirt, and very spacious breeches.

And then fair Haidée tried her tongue at speaking,

But not a word could Juan comprehend,
Although he listen'd so that the young Greek in
Her earnestness would ne'er have made an end ;
And as he interrupted not, went eking

Her speech out to her protégé and friend,
Till pausing at the last her breath to take,
She saw he did not understand Romain.

And then she had recourse to nods, and signs,
And smiles, and sparkles of the speaking eye,
And read (the only book she could) the lines
Of his fair face, and found, by sympathy,
'The answer eloquent, where the soul shines
And darts in one quick glance a long reply ;
And thus in every look she saw express'd
A world of words, and things at which she guess'd.

And now, by dint of fingers and of eyes,
And words repeated after her, he took
A lesson in her tongue ; but by surmise,
No doubt, less of her language than her look :
As he who studies fervently the skies
Turn oftener to the stars than to his book,
Thus Juan learn'd his alpha beta better
From Haidée's glance than any graven letter.

'Tis pleasing to be school'd in a strange tongue
By female lips and eyes—that is, I mean,
When both the teacher and the taught are young,
As was the case, at least, where I have been ;
They smile so when one's right, and when one's wrong [vene
They smile still more, and then there inter-
Pressure of hands, perhaps even a chaste kiss ;—
I learn'd the little that I know by this :

That is, some words of Spanish, Turk, and Greek,
Italian not at all, having no teachers ;
Much English I cannot pretend to speak,
Learning that language chiefly from its preachers,

Barrow, South, Tillotson, whom every week
I study, also Blair, the highest reachers
Of eloquence in piety and prose—
I hate your poets, so read none of those.

As for the ladies, I have nought to say,
A wanderer from the British world of fashion,
Where I, like other " dogs, have had my day,"
Like other men, too, may have had my passion—
But that, like other things, has pass'd away,

And all her fools whom I could lay the lash on :
Foes, friends, men, women, now are nought to me
But dreams of what has been, no more to be.

Return we to Don Juan. He begun
To hear new words, and to repeat them ; but
Some feelings, universal as the sun,
Were such as could not in his breast be shut
More than within the bosom of a nun :
He was in love,—as you would be, no doubt,
With a young benefactress,—so was she,
Just in the way we very often see.

And every day by daybreak—rather early
For Juan, who was somewhat fond of rest—
She came into the cave, but it was merely
To see her bird reposing in his nest ;
And she would softly stir his locks so curly,
Without disturbing her yet slumbering guest,
Breathing all gently o'er his cheek and mouth
As o'er a bed of roses the sweet south.

And every morn his colour freshlier came,
And every day help'd on his convalescence ;
'Twas well, because health in the human frame
Is pleasant, besides being true love's essence,
For health and idleness to passion's flame
Are oil and gunpowder ; and some good lessons
Are also learnt from Ceres and from Bacchus,
Without whom Venus will not long attack us.
* * * * *

When Juan woke he found some good things ready,
A bath, a breakfast, and the finest eyes
That ever made a youthful heart less steady,
Besides her maid's, as pretty for their size ;
But I have spoken of all this already—
And repetition's tiresome and unwise—
Well—Juan, after bathing in the sea,
Came always back to coffee and Haidée.

Both were so young, and one so innocent,
That bathing pass'd for nothing ; Juan seem'd
To her, as 't were, the kind of being sent,
Of whom these two years she had nightly
dream'd,

A something to be loved, a creature meant
To be her happiness, and whom she deem'd
To render happy ; all who joy would win
Must share it,—Happiness was born a twin.

It was such pleasure to behold him, such Enlargement of existence to partake
Nature with him, to thrill beneath his touch,
To watch him slumbering, and to see him
wake :

To live with him for ever were too much ;
But then the thought of parting made her quake ;
He was her own, her ocean-treasure cast
Like a rich wreck—her first love, and her last.

And thus a moon roll'd on, and fair Haidée
Paid daily visits to her boy, and took Such plentiful precautions, that still he Remain'd unknown within his craggy nook ;

At last her father's prow's put out to sea,
 For certain merchantmen upon the look,
 Not as of yore to carry off an Io,
 But three Ragusan vessels, bound for Scio.

Then came her freedom, for she had no mother,

So that, her father being at sea, she was Free as a married woman, or such other
 Female, as where she likes may freely pass,
 Without even the incumbrance of a brother,
 The freest she that ever gazed on glass:
 I speak of Christian lands in this comparison,
 Where wives, at least, are seldom kept in garrison.

Now she prolong'd her visits and her talk
 (For they must talk), and he had learnt to
 So much as to propose to take a walk,— [say
 For little had he wander'd since the day
 On which, like a young flower snapp'd from the stalk,
 Drooping and dewy on the beach he lay,—
 And thus they walk'd out in the afternoon,
 And saw the sun set opposite the moon.

It was a wild and breaker-beaten coast,
 With cliffs above, and a broad sandy shore,
 Guarded by shoals and rocks as by a host;
 With here and there a creek, whose aspect wore
 A better welcome to the tempest-tost;
 And rarely ceased the haughty billow's roar,
 Save on the dead long summer days, which make
 The outstretch'd ocean glitter like a lake.
 * * * * *

The coast—I think it was the coast that I
 Was just describing—Yes, it was the coast—
 Lay at this period quiet as the sky,
 The sands untumbled, the blue waves untost,
 And all was stillness, save the sea-bird's cry,
 And dolphin's leap, and little billow crost
 By some low rock or shelve, that made it fret
 Against the boundary it scarcely wet.

And forth they wander'd, her sire being gone,
 As I have said, upon an expedition;
 And mother, brother, guardian, she had none,
 Save Zoe, who although with due precision
 She waited on her lady with the sun,
 Thought daily service was her only mission,
 Bringing warm water, wreathing her long tresses,
 And asking now and then for cast-off dresses.

It was the cooling hour, just when the rounded
 Red sun sinks down behind the azure hill,
 Which then seems as if the whole earth it bound-
 ed,
 Circling all nature, hush'd, and dim, and still,
 With the far mountain-crescent half surrounded
 On one side, and the deep sea calm and chill

Upon the other, and the rosy sky,
 With one star sparkling through it like an eye.

And thus they wander'd forth, and hand in hand,
 Over the shining pebbles and the shells,
 Glided along the smooth and harden'd sand,
 And in the worn and wild receptacles Work'd by the storms, yet work'd as it were plann'd,
 In hollow halls, with sparry roofs and cells,
 They turn'd to rest; and, each clasp'd by an arm,
 Yielded to the deep twilight's purple charm.

They look'd up to the sky, whose floating glow
 Spread like a rosy ocean, vast and bright;
 They gazed upon the glittering sea below,
 Whence the broad moon rose circling into sight; [low
 They heard the waves splash, and the wind so
 And saw each other's dark eyes darting light
 Into each other—and, beholding this,
 Their lips drew near, and clung into a kiss;

A long, long kiss, a kiss of youth, and love,
 And beauty, all concentrating like rays
 Into one focus, kindled from above;
 Such kisses as belong to early days,
 Where heart, and soul, and sense, in concert
 move,
 And the blood's lava, and the pulse a blaze,
 Each kiss a heart-quake,—for a kiss's strength
 I think, it must be reckon'd by its length.

By length I mean duration; theirs endured Heaven knows how long—no doubt they never reckon'd;
 And if they had, they could not have secured
 The sum of their sensations to a second:
 They had not spoken; but they felt allured,
 As if their souls and lips each other beckon'd,
 Which, being join'd, like swarming bees they clung—
 Their hearts the flowers from whence the honey sprung.

They were alone, but not alone as they
 Who shut in chambers think it loneliness:
 The silent ocean, and the starlight bay,
 The twilight glow, which momentarily grew less,
 The voiceless-sands, and dropping caves, that lay
 Around them, made them to each other press,
 As if there were no life beneath the sky
 Save theirs, and that their life could never die.

They fear'd no eyes nor ears on that lone beach,
 They felt no terrors from the night, they were
 All in all to each other: though their speech
 Was broken words, they thought a language
 there,—
 And all the burning tongues the passions teach
 Found in one sigh the best interpreter
 Of nature's oracle—first love,—that all
 Which Eve has left her daughters since her fall.

Haidée spoke not of scruples, ask'd no vows,
 Nor offer'd any; she had never heard
 Of plight, and promises to be a spouse.
 Or perils by a loving maid incur'd;
 She was all which pure ignorance allows,
 And flew to her young mate like a young bird;
 And, never having dreamt of falsehood, she
 Had not one word to say of constancy.

She loved, and was beloved—she adored,
 And she was worshipp'd; after nature's fashion,
 Their intense souls, into each other pour'd,
 If souls could die, had perish'd in that passion,—
 But by degrees their senses were restored,
 Again to be o'ercome, again to dash on;
 And, beating 'gainst his bosom, Haidée's heart
 Felt as if never more to beat apart.

THE EVE OF ST. AGNES.

ST. AGNES' EVE—Ah, bitter chill it was!
 The owl, for all his feathers, was a-cold;
 The hare limp'd trembling through the frozen grass,
 And silent was the flock in woolly fold:
 Numb were the Beadsman's fingers, while he told
 His rosary, and while his frosted breath,
 Like pious incense from a censer old,
 Seem'd taking flight for heaven, without a death, [he saith.
 Past the sweet virgin's picture while his prayer

His prayer he saith, this patient holy man;
 Then takes his lamp, and riseth from his knees,
 And back returneth, meagre, barefoot, wan,
 Along the chapel aisle by slow degrees:
 The sculptur'd dead, on each side, seem to freeze,
 Emprison'd in black, purgatorial rails:
 Knights, ladies, praying in dumb oratories,
 He passeth by; and his weak spirit fails
 To think how they may ache in icy hoods and mails.

Northward he turneth through a little door,
 And scarce three steps, ere music's golden tongue
 Flatter'd to tears this aged man and poor;
 But no—already had his death-bell rung;
 The joys of all his life were said and sung:
 His was harsh penance on St. Agnes' Eve:
 Another way he went, and soon among

Rough ashes sat he for his soul's reprieve,
 And all night kept awake, for sinners' sake to grieve.

That ancient Beadsman heard the prelude soft;
 And so it chanc'd, for many a door was wide,
 From hurry to and fro. Soon, up aloft,
 The silver, snarling trumpets 'gan to chide:
 The level chambers, ready with their pride,
 Were glowing to receive a thousand guests:
 The carved angels, ever eager-eyed,
 Star'd, where upon their heads the cornice rests,
 With hair blown back, and wings put cross-wise
 on their breasts.

At length burst in the argent revelry,
 With plume, tiara, and all rich array,
 Numerous as shadows haunting fairily
 The brain, new stuff'd, in youth, with triumphs gay
 Of old romance. These let us wish away,
 And turn, sole-thoughted, to one lady there,
 Whose heart had brooded, all that wintry day,
 On love, and wing'd St. Agnes' saintly care,
 As she heard old dames full many times declare.

They told her how, upon St. Agnes' Eve,
 Young virgins might have visions of delight,
 And soft adorings from their loves receive
 Upon the honey'd middle of the night,
 If ceremonies due they did aright;
 As, supperless to bed they must retire,
 And couch supine their beauties, lily white;
 Nor look behind, nor sideways, but require
 Of Heaven with upward eyes for all that they desire.

Full of this whim was thoughtful Madeline:
 The music, yearning like a god in pain,
 She scarcely heard: her maiden eyes divine,
 Fix'd on the floor, saw many a sweeping train
 Pass by—she heeded not at all: in vain
 Came many a tiptoe, amorous cavalier,
 And back retir'd; not cool'd by high disdain,
 But she saw not: her heart was elsewhere:
 She sigh'd for Agnes' dreams, the sweetest of the year.

She danc'd along with vague, regardless eyes.
 Anxious her lips, her breathing quick and short:
 The hallow'd hour was near at hand: she sighs
 Amid the timbrels, and the throng'd resort
 Of whisperers in anger, or in sport;
 Mid looks of love, defiance, hate and scorn,
 Hoodwink'd with fairy fancy; all amorn,
 Save to St. Agnes and her lambs unshorn,
 And all the bliss to be before to-morrow morn.

So, purposing each moment to retire,
 She linger'd still. Meantime, across the moors,
 Had come young Porphyro, with heart on fire
 For Madeline. Beside the portal doors,

* Keats and Shelley should both have preceded Byron according to the plan of these selections, but the latter obtained the precedence by an error that was discovered too late for correction.

Buttress'd from moonlight, stands he, and implores
 All saints to give him sight of Madeline,
 But for one moment in the tedious hours,
 That he might gaze and worship all unseen ; Perchance speak, kneel, touch, kiss—in sooth such things have been.

He ventures in : let no buzz'd whisper tell :
 All eyes be muffled, or a hundred swords
 Will storm his heart, love's feverous citadel :
 For him, those chambers held barbarian hordes,
 Hyena foemen, and hot-blooded lords,
 Whose very dogs would execrations howl
 Against his lineage : not one breast affords
 Him any mercy, in that mansion foul,
 • Save one old beldame, weak in body and in soul.

Ah, happy chance ! the aged creature came,
 Shuffling along with ivory-headed wand,
 'T' where he stood, hid from the torch's flame,
 Behind a broad hall-pillar, far beyond
 The sound of merriment and chorus bland :
 He startled her ; but soon she knew his face,
 And grasp'd his fingers in her palsied hand,
 Saying, " Mercy, Porphyra ! hie thee from this place ;
 They are all here to-night, the whole bloodthirsty race !

Get hence ! get hence ! there's dwarfish Hilderbrand ;
 He had a fever late, and in the fit
 He cursed thee and thine, both house and land :
 Then there's that old Lord Maurice, not a whit
 More tame for his gray hairs— Alas me ! flit !
 Flit like a ghost away."—" Ah, Gossip dear,
 We're safe enough : here in this arm-chair sit,
 And tell me how"—" Good saints ! not here,
 not here ; [bier."
 Follow me, child, or else these stones will be thy

He follow'd through a lowly arched way,
 Brushing the cobwebs with his lofty plume,
 And as she mutter'd " Well-a—well-a-day !"
 He found him in a little moonlight room,
 Pale, lattic'd, chill, and silent as a tomb.
 " Now tell me where is Madeline," said he,
 " O tell me, Angela, by the holy loom
 Which none but secret sisterhood may see,
 When they St. Agnes' wool are weaving piously."

" St. Agnes ! ah ! it is St. Agnes' eve—
 Yet men must murder upon holy days :
 Thou must hold water in a witch's sieve,
 And be liege-lord of all the elves and fays,
 To venture so : it fills me with amaze
 To see thee, Porphyro !—St. Agnes' eve !
 God's help ! my lady fair the conjuror plays
 This very night : good angels her deceive !
 But let me laugh awhile, I've mickle time to grieve."

Feebly she laugheth in the languid moon,
 While Porphyro upon her face doth look,
 Like puzzled urchin on an aged crone
 Who keepeth clos'd a wondrous riddle-book,
 As spectacled she sits in chimney nook.
 But soon his eyes grew brilliant, when she told

His lady's purpose ; and he scarce could brook
 Tears, at the thought of those enchantments
 cold.

And Madeline asleep in lap of legends old.

Sudden a thought came like a full-blown rose,
 Flushing his brow, and in his pained heart
 Made purple riot : then doth he propose
 A stratagem, that makes the beldame start :
 " A cruel man and impious thou art :
 Sweet lady, let her pray, and sleep, and dream
 Alone with her good angels, far apart
 From wicked men like thee. Go !—I deem Thou canst not surely be the same that thou didst seem."

" I will not harm her, by all saints I swear," Quoth Porphyro : " O may I ne'er find grace,
 When my weak voice shall whisper its last
 prayer,
 If one of her soft ringlets I displace,
 Or look with ruffian passion in her face :
 Good Angela, believe me by these tears ;
 Or I will, even in a moment's space,
 Awake with horrid shout my foemen's ears,
 And beard them, though they be more fang'd
 than wolves and bears."

" Ah ! why wilt thou affright a feeble soul ?
 A poor, weak, palsy-stricken, churchyard thing,
 Whose passing-bell may ere the midnight toll ;
 Whose prayers for thee, each morn and evening,
 Were never miss'd."—Thus plaining, doth she bring
 A gentler speech from burning Porphyro ;
 So woeful, and of such deep sorrowing,
 That Angela gives promise she will do
 Whatever he shall wish, betide her weal or woe.

Which was, to lead him, in close secrecy,
 Even to Madeline's chamber, and there hide
 Him in a closet, of such privacy
 That he might see her beauty unespied,
 And win perhaps that night a peerless bride,
 While legion'd fairies pac'd the coverlet,
 And pale enchantment held her sleepy-eyed.
 Never on such a night have lovers met,
 Since Merlin paid his Demon all the monstrous debt.

" It shall be as thou wishest," said the dame :
 " All cates and dainties shall be stored there
 Quickly on this feast-night : by the tambour frame
 Her own lute thou wilt see : no time to spare,
 For I am slow and feeble, and scarce dare

On such a catering trust my dizzy head.
Wait here, my child, with patience ; kneel in prayer
The while : ah ! thou must needs the lady wed,
Or may I never leave my grave among the dead."

So saying, she hobbled off with busy fear.
The lover's endless minutes slowly pass'd ;
The dame return'd, and whisper'd in his ear
To follow her ; with aged eyes aghast
From fright of dim espial. Safe at last,
Through many a dusky gallery, they gain
The maiden's chamber, silken, hush'd, and chaste ;
Where Porphyro took covert, pleas'd amain.
His poor guide hurried back with agues in her brain.

Her falt'ring hand upon the balustrade,
Old Angela was feeling for the stair,
When Madeline, St. Agnes' charmed maid,
Rose, like a mission'd spirit, unaware :
With silver taper's light, and pious care,
She turn'd, and down the aged gossip led
To a safe level matting. Now prepare,
Young Porphyro, for gazing on that bed ;
She comes, she comes again, like ring-dove frayed and fled.

Out went the taper as she hurried in ;
Its lit'le smoke, in pallid moonshine, died :
She closed the door, she panted, all akin
To spirits of the air and visions wide :
No uttered syllable, or, woe betide !
But to her heart, her heart was voluble,
Paining with eloquence her balmy side ;
As though a tongueless nightingale should swell [dell.
Her throat in vain, and die, heart-stifled, in her

A casement high and triple-arch'd there was,
All garlanded with carven imag'ries
Of fruits, and flowers, and bunches of knotgrass,
And diamonded with panes of quaint device,
Innumerable of stains and splendid dyes,
As are the tiger-moth's deep-damask'd wings ;
And in the midst, 'mong thousand heraldries,
And twilight saints, and dim emblazonings,
A shielded scutcheon blush'd with blood of queens and kings.

Full on this casement shone the wintry moon,
And threw warm gules on Madeline's fair
breast,
As down she knelt for heaven's grace and boon ;
Rose-bloom fell on her hands, together prest,
And on her silver cross soft amethyst,
And on her hair a glory, like a saint :
She seem'd a splendid angel, newly drest,
Save wings for heaven :—Porphyro grew faint :
She knelt, so pure a thing, so free from mortal taint.

Anon his heart revives : her vespers done,
Of all its wreathed pearls her hair she frees ;
Unclasps her warmed jewels one by one,
Loosens her fragrant boddice ; by degrees
Her rich attire creeps rustling to her knees :
Half-hidden, like a mermaid in sea-weed,
Pensive awhile she dreams awake, and sees,
In fancy, fair St. Agnes in her bed,
But dares not look behind, or all the charm is fled.

Soon, trembling in her soft and chilly nest,
In sort of wakeful swoon, perplex'd she lay,
Until the popped warmth of sleep oppress'd
Her soothed limbs, and soul fatigued away ;
Flown, like a thought, until the morrow-
day ;
Blissfully heaven'd both from joy and pain ;
Clasp'd like a missal where swart Paynims
pray ;
Blinded alike from sunshine and from rain,
As though a rose should shut, and be a bud
again.

Stol'n to this paradise, and so entranced,
Porphyro gazed upon her empty dress,
And listen'd to her breathing, if it chanced
To wake into a slumberous tenderness ;
Which when he heard, that minute did he bless,
And breath'd himself : then from the closet
crept,
Noiseless as fear in a wide wilderness,
And over the hush'd carpet, silent, stept,
And 'tween the curtains peep'd, where, lo !—how fast she slept.

Then by the bed-side, where the faded moon
Made a dim, silver twilight, soft he set
A table, and, half anguish'd, threw thereon
A cloth of woven crimson, gold, and jet :—
O for some drowsy Morphean amulet !
The boisterous, midnight, festive clarion,
The kettle drum, and far-heard clarionet,
Affray his ears, though but in dying tone :—
The hall door shuts again, and all the noise is gone.

And still she slept an azure-lidded sleep,
In blanched linen, smooth, and lavender'd,
While he from forth the closet brought a heap
Of candied apple, quince, and plum, and gourd ;
With jellies soother than the creamy curd,
And lucent syrups, tinct with cinnamon,
Manna and dates, in argosy transferr'd
From Fez, and spiced dainties, every one,
From silken Samarcand to cedar'd Lebanon.

These delicacies he heap'd with glowing hand
On golden dishes and in baskets bright
Of wreathed silver : sumptuous they stand
In the retired quiet of the night,
Filling the chilly room with perfume light.—
" And now, my love, my seraph fair, awake !

Thou art my heaven, and I thine eremite :
Open thine eyes, for meek St. Agnes' sake,
Or I shall drowse beside thee, so my soul doth ache."

Thus whispering, his warm, unnerved arm
Sank in her pillow. Shaded was her dream
By the dusk curtains : — 'twas a midnight charm
Impossible to melt as iced stream :
The lustrous salvers in the moonlight gleam ;
Broad golden fringe upon the carpet lies :
It seem'd he never, never could redeem
From such a steadfast spell his lady's eyes ;
So mus'd awhile, entoid'd in woofed phantasies.

Awakening up, he took her hollow lute,— Tumultuous,—and, in chords that tenderest
be,
He play'd an ancient ditty, long since mute,
In Provence call'd, " La belle dame sans mercy :"
Close to her ear touching the melody ;—
Wherewith disturb'd, she utter'd a soft moan :
He ceased—she panted quick—and suddenly
Her blue affrayed eyes wide open shone :
Upon his knees he sank, pale as smooth-sculptured stone.

Her eyes were open, but she still beheld,
Now wide awake, the vision of her sleep :
There was a painful change, that nigh expell'd
The blisses of her dream so pure and deep ;
At which fair Madeline began to weep,
And moan forth witless words with many a sigh ;
While still her gaze on Porphyro would keep ;
Who knelt, with joined hands and piteous
eye,
Fearing to move or speak, she look'd so dream-ingly.

" Ah, Porphyro !" said she, " but even now
Thy voice was at sweet tremble in mine ear,
Made tuneable with every sweetest vow ;
And those sad eyes were spiritual and clear :
How chang'd thou art ! how pallid, chill, and drear !
Give me that voice again, my Porphyro,
Those looks immortal, those complainings
dear !
Oh leave me not in this eternal woe,
For if thou diest, my love, I know not where to go."

Beyond a mortal man impassion'd far
At these voluptuous accents, he arose,
Ethereal, flush'd, and like a throbbing star
Seen mid the sapphire heaven's deep repose ;
Into her dream he melted, as the rose
Blendeth its odour with the violet,—
Solution sweet : meantime the frost-wind blows
Like love's alarm pattering the sharp sleet Against the window-panes ; St. Agnes' moon hath set.

"Tis dark : quick pattereth the flaw-blown sleet :

" This is no dream, my bride, my Madeline !"
"Tis dark : the icid gusts still rave and beat :
" No dream, alas ! alas ! and woe is mine !
Porphyro will leave me here to fade and pine—
Cruel ! what traitor could thee hither bring ?
I curse not, for my heart is lost in thine,
Though thou forsakest a deceived thing ;
A dove forlorn and lost with sick unpruned wing."

" My Madeline ! sweet dreamer ! lovely bride !
Say, may I be for aye thy vassal blest ?
Thy beauty's shield, heart-shap'd and vermeil
dyed ?
Ah, silver shrine, here will I take my rest
After so many hours of toil and quest,
A famish'd pilgrim,—saved by miracle.
Though I have found, I will not rob thy nest
Saving of thy sweet self ; if thou think'st well
To trust, fair Madeline, to no rude infidel."

" Hark ! 'tis an elfin-storm from fairy land,
Of haggard seeming, but a boon indeed :
Arise—arise ! the morning is at hand ;—
The bloated wassailers will never heed :—
Let us away, my love, with happy speed ;
There are no ears to hear, or eyes to see,—
Drown'd all in Rhenish and the sleepy mead :
Awake ! arise ! my love, and fearless be,
For o'er the southern moors I have a home for
thee."

She hurried at his words, beset with fears,
For there were sleeping dragons all around,
At glaring watch, perhaps, with ready spears—
Down the wide stairs a darkling way they found.—
In all the house was heard not human sound.
A chain-droop'd lamp was flickering by each
door ;
The arras, rich with horseman, hawk, and hound,
Flutter'd in the besieging wind's uproar ;
And the long carpets rose along the gusty floor.

They glide, like phantoms, into the wide
hall ;
Like phantoms, to the iron porch, they glide ;
Where lay the porter, in uneasy sprawl,
With a huge empty flagon by his side :
The wakeful bloodhound rose, and shook his hide,
But his sagacious eye an inmate owns :
By one, and one, the bolts full easy slide :—
The chains lie silent on the footworn stones ;—
The key turns, and the door upon its hinges groans.

And they are gone : ay, ages long ago
These lovers fled away into the storm.
That night the baron dreamt of many a woe,
And all his warrior-guests, with shade and form

Of witch, and demon, and large coffin-worm,
 Were long be-nightmar'd. Angela the old
 Died palsy-twitch'd, with meagre face deform;
 The Beadsman, after thousand aves told,
 For aye unsought for slept among his ashes cold.

SOLITUDE.

O, SOLITUDE! if I must with thee dwell,
 Let it not be among the jumbled heap
 Of murky buildings: climb with me the steep,—
 Nature's observatory—whence the dell,
 Its flowery slopes, its river's crystal swell,
 May seem a span; let me thy vigils keep
 'Mongst boughs pavilioned, where the deer's swift leap,
 Startles the wild bee from the fox-glove bell.
 But though I'll gladly trace those scenes with
 thee,
 Yet the sweet converse of an innocent mind,
 Whose words are images of thoughts refined,
 Is my soul's pleasure; and it sure must be Almost the highest bliss of human kind
 When to thy haunts two kindred spirits flee.

ON FIRST LOOKING INTO CHAPMAN'S HOMER.

MUCH have I travelled in the realms of gold,
 And many goodly states and kingdoms seen;
 Round many western islands have I been
 Which bards in fealty to Apollo hold.
 Oft of one wide expanse had I been told
 That deep-browed Homer ruled as his demesne:
 Yet did I never breathe its pure serene
 Till I heard Chapman speak out loud and bold:
 Then felt I like some watcher of the skies
 When a new planet swims into his ken;
 Or like stout Cortez when with eagle eyes
 He stared on the Pacific—and all his men
 Looked at each other with a wild surmise—
 Silent, upon a peak in Darien.

ON THE GRASSHOPPER AND THE CRICKET.

THE poetry of earth is never dead:
 When all the birds are faint with the hot sun,
 And hide in cooling trees, a voice will run
 From hedge to hedge about the new-mown mead:
 That is the grasshopper's—he takes the lead
 In summer luxury—he has never done
 With his delights, for when tired out with fun,
 He rests at eve beneath some pleasant weed.
 The poetry of earth is ceasing never:
 On a lone winter evening, when the frost
 Has wrought a silence, from the stove there shrills
 The cricket's song, in warmth increasing ever,
 And seems to one in drowsiness half lost,
 The grasshopper's among the grassy hills.

THE DEDICATION OF THE REVOLT OF ISLAM.

So now my summer task is ended, Mary,
 And I return to thee, mine own heart's home;
 As to his queen some victor knight of faery,
 Earning bright spoils for her enchanted dome;
 Nor thou disdain, that ere my fame become
 A star among the stars of mortal night,
 If it indeed may cleave its natal gloom,
 Its doubtful promise thus I would unite
 With thy beloved name, thou child of love and light.

The toil which stole from thee so many an hour
 Is ended.—And the fruit is at thy feet!
 No longer where the woods to frame a bower
 With interlaced branches mix and meet,
 Or where with sound like many voices sweet
 Water-falls leap among wild islands green
 Which framed for my lone boat a lone retreat
 Of moss-grown trees and weeds, shall I be seen:
 But beside thee, where still my heart has ever been.

Thoughts of great deeds were mine, dear friend,
 when first
 The clouds which wrap this world from youth did pass,
 I do remember well the hour which burst
 My spirit's sleep: a fresh Mayday it was,
 When I walked forth upon the glittering grass,
 And wept I knew not why; until there rose
 From the near school-room, voices, that alas!
 Were but one echo from a world of woes,
 The harsh and grating strife of tyrants and of foes.

And then I clasped my hands and looked around—
 But none was near to mock my streaming eyes,
 Which poured the warm drops on the sunny
 ground—
 So without shame, I spake:—"I will be wise,
 And just, and free, and mild, if in me lies
 Such power; for I grow weary to behold
 The selfish and the strong still tyrannize Without reproach or check." I then controlled
 My tears, my heart grew calm, and I was meek and bold.

And from that hour did I with earnest thought
 Heap knowledge from forbidden mines of lore;
 Yet nothing that my tyrants knew or taught
 I cared to learn, but from that secret store
 Wrought linked armour for my soul, before

It might walk forth to war among mankind ;
 Thus power and hope were strengthend more and more
 Within me, till there came upon my mind
 A sense of loneliness, a thirst with which I pined.

Alas, that love should be a blight and snare
 To those who seek all sympathies in one! —
 Such once I sought in vain; then black despair,
 The shadow of a starless night, was thrown
 Over the world in which I moved alone: —
 Yet never found I one not false to me,
 Hard hearts, and cold, like weights of icy stone
 Which crushed and withered mine, that could not be
 Aught but a lifeless clog until revived by thee.

Thou friend, whose presence on my wintry heart
 Fell like bright spring upon some herbless
 plain ;
 How beautiful and calm and free thou wert
 In thy young wisdom, when the mortal chain
 Of custom thou didst burst and rend in twain,
 And walked as free as light the clouds among,
 Which many an envious slave then breathed in vain
 From his dim dungeon, and my spirit sprung
 To meet thee from the woes which had begirt it long !

No more alone through the world's wilderness,
 Although I trod the paths of high intent,
 I journeyed now : no more companionless,
 Where solitude is like despair, I went.—
 There is the wisdom of a stern content,
 When poverty can blight the just and good,
 When infamy dares mock the innocent,
 And cherished friends turn with the multitude
 To trample : this was ours, and we unshaken stood !

Now has descended a serener hour,
 And with inconstant fortune friends return ;
 Though suffering leaves the knowledge and the power,
 Which says :—let scorn be not repaid with scorn.
 And from thy side two gentle babes are born
 To fill our home with smiles, and thus are we
 Most fortunate beneath life's beaming morn ;
 And these delights, and thou, have been to
 me
 The parents of the song I consecrate to thee.

Is it that now my inexperienced fingers
 But strike the prelude to a loftier strain ?
 Or must the lyre on which my spirit lingers
 Soon pause in silence ne'er to sound again,
 Though it might shake the anarch Custom's
 reign,
 And charm the minds of men to Truth's own
 sway,
 Holier than was Amphion's ? it would fain

Reply in hope—but I am worn away,
 And death and love are yet contending for their prey.

And what art thou ? I know, but dare not speak :
 Time may interpret to his silent years.
 Yet in the paleness of thy thoughtful cheek,
 And in the light thine ample forehead wears,
 And in thy sweetest smiles, and in thy tears,
 And in thy gentle speech, a prophecy
 Is whispered to subdue my fondest fears :
 And through thine eyes, even in thy soul I see
 A lamp of vestal fire burning internally.

They say that thou wert lovely from thy birth
 Of glorious parents, thou aspiring child.
 I wonder not—for one then left this earth
 Whose life was like a setting planet mild,
 Which clothed thee in the radiance undefiled
 Of its departing glory ; still her fame
 Shines on thee, through the tempests dark and wild
 Which shake these latter days, and thou canst claim
 The shelter from thy sire, of an immortal name.

One voice came forth from many a mighty spirit
 Which was the echo of three thousand years ;
 And the tumultuous world stood mute to hear it,
 As some lone man, who in a desert hears
 The music of his home :—unwonted fears
 Fell on the pale oppressors of our race,
 And faith and custom and low-thoughted cares,
 Like thunder stricken dragons, for a space
 Left the torn human heart, their food and dwelling place.

Truth's deathless voice pauses among mankind !
 If there must be no response to my cry—
 If men must rise and stamp with fury blind
 On his pure name who loves them,—thou and I,
 Sweet friend ! can look from our tranquillity
 Like lamps into the world's tempestuous night,—
 Two tranquil stars, while clouds are passing by,
 Which wrap them from the foundering seaman's
 sight,
 That burn from year to year with unextinguished
 light.

SONNET.—OZYMANDIAS.

I MET a traveller from an antique land,
 Who said : two vast and trunkless legs of stone
 Stand in the desert. Near them, on the sand,
 Half sunk, a shattered visage lies, whose frown,
 And wrinkled lip, and sneer of cold command :
 Tell that its sculptor well those passions read
 Which yet survive, stamped on these lifeless things,
 The hand that mocked them and the heart that
 fed :

And on the pedestal these words appear :
 " My name is Ozymandias, king of kings :
 Look on my works, ye mighty, and despair !"
 Nothing beside remains ! Round the decay
 Of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare
 The lone and level sands stretch far away.

STANZAS WRITTEN IN DEJECTION NEAR NAPLES.

THE sun is warm, the sky is clear,
 The waves are dancing fast and bright,
 Blue isles and snowy mountains wear
 The purple noon's transparent light

† * * * * *
 Around its unexpanded buds ;
 Like many a voice of one delight,
 The winds, the birds, the ocean floods,
 The city's voice itself is soft, like Solitude's.

I see the deep's untrampled floor
 With green and purple sea-weeds strown ;
 I see the waves upon the shore,
 Like light dissolved in star-showers, thrown.
 I sit upon the sands alone ;
 The lightning of the noon-tide ocean
 Is flashing round me, and a tone
 Arises from its measured motion ;
 How sweet ! did any heart now share in my emotion.

Alas ! I have nor hope, nor health,
 Nor peace within, nor calm around,
 Nor that content surpassing wealth,
 The sage in meditation found,
 And wa'k'd with inward glory crown'd ;
 Nor fame, nor power, nor love, nor leisure.
 Others I see whom these surround ;
 Smiling they live, and call life pleasure ; —
 To me that cup has been dealt in another measure.

Yet now despair itself is mild,
 Ev'n as the winds and waters are ;
 I could lie down like a tired child,
 And weep away this life of care
 Which I have borne and yet must bear,
 Till death, like sleep, might steal on me,
 And I might feel in the warm air
 My cheek grow cold, and hear the sea
 Breathe o'er my dying brain its last monotony.

Some might lament that I were cold,
 As I when this sweet day is done,
 Which my lost heart, too soon grown old,
 Insults with this untimely moan :
 They might lament, for I am one
 Whom men love not, and yet regret ;
 Unlike this day, which, when the sun
 Shall on its stainless glory set,
 Will linger, though enjoy'd, like joy in memory yet.

THE LAY OF THE LAST MINSTREL.

Introduction.

THE way was long, the wind was cold,
 The Minstrel was infirm and old ;
 His withered cheek, and tresses gray,
 Seemed to have known a better day ;
 The harp, his sole remaining joy,
 Was carried by an orphan boy.
 The last of all the Bards was he,
 Who sung of Border chivalry ;
 For, well a-day ! their date was fled,
 His tuneful brethren all were dead ;
 And he, neglected and oppressed,
 Wished to be with them, and at rest.

No more, on prancing palfrey borne,
 He carolled, light as lark at morn ;
 No longer, courted and caressed,
 High placed in hall, a welcome guest,
 He poured, to lord and lady gay,
 The unpremeditated lay ;
 Old times were changed, old manners gone,
 A stranger filled the Stuart's throne ;
 The bigots of the iron time
 Had called his harmless art a crime.
 A wandering harper, scorned and poor,
 He begged his bread from door to door ;
 And tuned, to please a peasant's ear,
 The harp, a king had loved to hear.

He passed where Newark's stately tower
 Looks out from Yarrow's birchen bower :
 The minstrel gazed with wishful eye —
 No humbler resting place was nigh.
 With hesitating step, at last,
 The embattled portal-arch he passed,
 Whose ponderous grate, and massy bar,
 Had oft rolled back the tide of war,
 But never closed the iron door
 Against the desolate and poor.
 The duchess marked his weary pace,
 His timid mien, and reverend face,
 And bade her page the menials tell,
 That they should tend the old man well :
 For she had known adversity,
 Though born in such a high degree ;
 In pride of power, in beauty's bloom,
 Had wept o'er Monmouth's bloody tomb !

When kindness had his wants supplied,
 And the old man was gratified,
 Began to rise his minstrel pride.
 And he began to talk, anon,
 Of good Earl Francis, dead and gone,
 And of Earl Walter, rest him God !
 A braver ne'er to battle rode :
 And how full many a tale he knew

Of the old warriors of Buccleuch ;
 And, would the noble duchess deign
 To listen to an old man's strain,
 Though stiff his hand, his voice though weak,
 He thought even yet, the sooth to speak,
 That, if she loved the harp to hear,
 He could make music to her ear.

The humble boon was soon obtained ;
 The aged Minstrel audience gained.
 But, when he reached the room of state,
 Where she, with all her ladies, sate,
 Perchance he wished his boon denied ;
 For, when to tune his harp he tried,
 His trembling hand had lost the ease,
 Which marks security to please ;
 And scenes, long past, of joy and pain,
 Came wildering o'er his aged brain—
 He tried to tune his harp in vain.
 The pitying duchess praised its chime,
 And gave him heart, and gave him time,
 Till every string's according glee
 Was blended into harmony.
 And then, he said, he would full fain
 He could recal an ancient strain,
 He never thought to sing again.
 It was not framed for village churls,
 But for high dames and mighty earls ;
 He had played it to king Charles the good,
 When he kept court at Holyrood ;
 And much he wished, yet feared, to try
 The long-forgotten melody.

Amid the strings his fingers strayed,
 And an uncertain warbling made—
 And oft he shook his hoary head.
 But when he caught the measure wild,
 The old man raised his face, and smiled ;
 And lightened up his faded eye,
 With all a poet's extacy !
 In varying cadence, soft or strong,
 He swept the sounding chords along ;
 The present scene, the future lot,
 His toils, his wants, were all forgot ;
 Cold diffidence, and age's frost,
 In the full tide of song were lost.
 Each blank, in faithless memory void,
 The poet's glowing thought supplied ;
 And, while his harp responsive rung,
 'Twas thus the LATEST MINSTREL sung.

Canto First.

I.

THE feast was over in Branksome tower,
 And the Ladye had gone to her secret bower ;
 Her bower, that was guarded by word and by spell,
 Deadly to hear, and deadly to tell—
 Jesu Maria, shield us well !
 No living wight, save the Ladye alone,
 Had dared to cross the threshold stone.

II.

The tables were drawn, it was idlesse all ;
 Knight, and page, and household squire,
 Loitered through the lofty hall,
 Or crowded round the ample fire.
 The stag-hounds, weary with the chase,
 Lay stretched upon the rushy floor,
 And urged, in dreams, the forest race,
 From Teviot-stone to Eskdale-moor.

III.

Nine-and-twenty knights of fame
 Hung their shields in Branksome Hall ;
 Nine-and-twenty squires of name,
 Brought them their steeds from bower to stall ;
 Nine-and-twenty yeomen tall,
 Waited, duteous, on them all :
 They were all knights of mettle true,
 Kinsmen to the bold Buccleuch.

IV.

Ten of them were sheathed in steel,
 With belted sword, and spur on heel :
 They quitted not their harness bright,
 Neither by day, nor yet by night :
 They lay down to rest
 With corslet laced,
 Pillowed on buckler cold and hard ;
 They carved at the meal
 With gloves of steel,
 And they drank the red wine through the helmet barred.

V.

Ten squires, ten yeomen, mail-clad men,
 Waited the beck of the warders ten.
 Thirty steeds, both fleet and wight,
 Stood saddled in stable day and night,
 Barbed with frontlet of steel, I trow,
 And with Jedwood-axe at saddle bow.
 A hundred more fed free in stall—
 Such was the custom of Branksome Hall.

VI.

Why do these steeds stand ready dight ?
 Why watch these warriors, armed, by night ?
 They watch to hear the blood-hound baying ;
 They watch to hear the war-horn braying ;
 To see St. George's red cross streaming,
 To see the midnight beacon gleaming ;
 They watch against southern force and guile,
 Lest Scroope, or Howard, or Percy's powers,
 Threaten Branksome's lordly towers,
 From Warkworth, or Naworth, or merry Carlisle.

VII.

Such is the custom of Branksome-Hall.
 Many a valiant knight is here :
 But he, the chieftain of them all,
 His sword hangs rusting on the wall,
 Beside his broken spear.
 Bards long shall tell,
 How lord Walter fell !
 When startled burghers fled, afar,
 The furies of the Border war ;
 When the streets of high Dunedin
 Saw lances gleam, and falchions redden,
 And heard the slogan's deadly yell—
 Then the Chief of Branksome fell.

VIII.

Can piety the discord heal,
 Or staunch the death-feud's enmity ;
 Can Christian lore, can patriot zeal,
 Can love of blessed charity ;
 No ! vainly to each holy shrine,
 In mutual pilgrimage, they drew ;
 Implored, in vain, the grace divine
 For chiefs, their own red falchions slew.
 While Cessford owns the rule of Car,
 While Ettrick boasts the line of Scott,
 The slaughtered chiefs, the mortal jar,
 The havoc of the feudal war,
 Shall never, never be forgot !

IX.

In sorrow, o'er lord Walter's bier,
 The warlike foresters had bent ;
 And many a flower, and many a tear,
 Old Teviot's maids and matrons lent :
 But, o'er her warrior's bloody bier,
 The lady dropped nor sigh nor tear !
 Vengeance, deep-brooding o'er the slain,
 Had locked the source of softer woe ;
 And burning pride, and high disdain,
 Forbade the rising tear to flow ;
 Until, amid his sorrowing clan,
 Her son lisped from the nurse's knee—
 " And, if I live to be a man,
 " My father's death revenged shall be !"
 Then fast the mother's tears did seek
 To dew the infant's kindling cheek.

X.

All loose her negligent attire,
 All loose her golden hair,
 Hung Margaret o'er her slaughtered sire,
 And wept in wild despair.
 But not alone the bitter tear
 Had filial grief supplied ;
 For hopeless love, and anxious fear,
 Had lent their mingled tide ;
 Nor in her mother's altered eye
 Dared she to look for sympathy.
 Her lover, 'gainst her father's clan,
 With Car in arms had stood,
 When Mathouse burn to Melrose ran,
 All purple with their blood.
 And well she knew, her mother dread,
 Before Lord Cranstoun she should wed,
 Would see her on her dying bed.

XI.

Of noble race the ladye came ;
 Her father was a clerk of fame,
 Of Bethune's line of Picardie :
 He learned the art, that none may name,
 In Padua, far beyond the sea.
 Men said he changed his mortal frame
 By feat of magic mystery ;
 For when, in studious mood, he paced
 St. Kentigern's hall,
 His form no darkening shadow traced
 Upon the sunny wall !

XII.

And of his skill, as bards avow,
 He taught that ladye fair,

Till to her bidding she could bow
 The viewless forms of air.
 And now she sits in secret bower,
 In old Lord David's western tower,
 And listens to a heavy sound,
 That moans the mossy turrets round.
 Is it the roar of Teviot's tide,
 That chafes against the scaur's red side ?
 Is it the wind that swings the oaks ?
 Is it the echo from the rocks ?
 What may it be, the heavy sound,
 That moans old Branksome's turrets round ?

XIII.

At the sullen, moaning sound,
 The ban-dogs bay and howl ;
 And, from the turrets round,
 Loud whoops the startled owl.
 In the hall, both squire and knight
 Swore that a storm was near,
 And looked forth to view the night ;
 But the night was still and clear !

XIV.

From the sound of Teviot's tide,
 Chasing with the mountain's side,
 From the groan of the wind-swung oak,
 From the sullen echo of the rock,
 From the voice of the coming storm,
 The ladye knew it well !
 It was the Spirit of the Flood that spoke,
 And he called on the Spirit of the Fell.

XV.

RIVER SPIRIT.

" Sleepest thou, brother ?"

MOUNTAIN SPIRIT.

————— " Brother, nay—

On my hills the moon-beams play.
 From Craik-cross to Skelfhill-pen,
 By every rill, in every glen,
 Merry elves, their merrice pacing,
 To aerial minstrelsy,
 Emerald rings on brown heath tracing,
 Trip it deft and merrily.
 Up, and mark their nimble feet !
 Up, and list their music sweet !"

XVI.

RIVER SPIRIT.

" Tears of an imprisoned maiden
 Mix with my polluted stream ;
 Margaret of Branksome, sorrow-laden,
 Mourns beneath the moon's pale beam.
 Tell me, thou, who viewest the stars,
 When shall cease these feudal jars ?
 What shall be the maiden's fate ?
 Who shall be the maiden's mate ?"

XVII.

MOUNTAIN SPIRIT.

" Arthur's slow wain his course doth roll,
 In utter darkness, round the pole ;
 The Northern Bear lowers black and grim ;
 Orion's studded belt, is dim :
 Twinkling faint, and distant far,
 Shimmers through mist each planet star ;
 Ill may I read their high decree :
 But no kind influence deign they shower

On Teviot's tide, and Branksome's tower,
Till pride be quelled, and love be free."

XVIII.

The unearthly voices ceast,
And the heavy sound was still ;
It died on the river's breast,
It died on the side of the hill—
But round Lord David's tower
The sound still floated near ;
For it rung in the ladye's bower,
And it rung in the ladye's ear.
She raised her stately head,
And her heart throbb'd high with pride :
" Your mountains shall bend,
And your streams ascend,
Ere Margaret be our foeman's bride !"

XIX.

The ladye sought the lofty hall,
Where many a bold retainer lay,
And, with jocund din, among them all,
Her son pursued his infant play.
A fancied moss-trooper, the boy
The truncheon of a spear bestrode,
And round the hall, right merrily,
In mimic foray rode.
Even bearded knights, in arms grown old,
Share in his frolic gambols bore,
Albeit their hearts, of rugged mould,
Were stubborn as the steel they wore.
For the gray warriors prophesied,
How the brave boy, in future war,
Should tame the Unicorn's pride,
Exalt the Crescents and the Star.

XX.

The ladye forgot her purpose high,
One moment, and no more ;
One moment gazed with a mother's eye,
As she paused at the arched door,
Then, from amid the armed train,
She called to her William of Deloraine.

XXI.

A stark moss-trooping Scott was he,
As e'er couched border lance by knee.
Through Solway sands, through Tarras moss,
Blindfold, he knew the paths to cross ;
By wily turns, by desperate bounds,
Had baffled Percy's best blood-hounds ;
In Eske, or Liddell, fords were none,
But he would ride them one by one ;
Alike to him was time, or tide,
December's snow, or July's pride ;
Alike to him was tide, or time,
Moonless midnight, or matin prime.
Steady of heart, and stout of hand,
As ever drove prey from Cumberland :
Five times outlawed had he been,
By England's king and Scotland's queen.

XXII.

" Sir William of Deloraine, good at need,
Mount thee on the wightest steed ;
Spare not to spur, nor stint to ride,
Until thou come to fair Tweedside ;
And in Melrose's holy pile
Seek thou the monk of St. Mary's isle :

Greet the father well from me ;
Say, that the fated hour is come,
And to night he shall watch with thee,
To win the treasure of the tomb :
For this will be St. Michael's night,
And though stars be dim, the moon is bright ;
And the cross of bloody red
Will point to the grave of the mighty dead."

XXIII.

" What he gives thee, see thou keep !
Stay not thou for food or sleep.
Be it scroll, or be it book,
Into, knight, thou must not look ;
If thou redest thou art lorn !
Better hadst thou ne'er been born."

XXIV.

" O swiftly can speed my dapple-gray steed,
Who drinks of the Teviot clear ;
Ere break of day," the warrior 'gan say,
" Again will I be here :
And safer by none may thy errand be done,
Than, noble dame, by me ;
Letter nor line know I never a one,
Wer't my neck-verse at Hairibee."

XXV.

Soon in his saddle sate he fast,
And soon the steep descent he past ;
Soon crossed the sounding barbican
And soon the Teviot side he won.
Eastward the wooded path he rode ;
Green hazels o'er his basnet nod ;
He passed the Peel of Goldiland,
And crossed old Borthwick's roaring strand ;
Dimly he viewed the Moat-hill's mound,
Where Druid shades still fitted round :
In Hawick twinkled many a light ;
Behind him soon they set in night ;
And soon he spurred his courser keen
Beneath the tower of Hazeldean.

XXVI.

The clattering hoofs the watchmen mark ;
" Stand, ho ! thou courier of the dark."
" For Branksome, ho !" the knight rejoined,

And left the friendly tower behind.
He turned him now from Teviotside,
And, guided by the tinkling rill,
Northward the dark ascent did ride,
And gained the moor at Horsliehill ;
Broad on the left before him lay,
For many a mile, the Roman way.

XXVII.

A moment now he slacked his speed,
A moment breathed his panting steed ;
Drew saddle-girth and corslet-band,
And loosened in the sheath his brand.
On Minto-crag the moon-beams glint,
Where Barnhill hewed his bed of flint ;
Who flung his outlawed limbs to rest,
Where falcons hang their giddy nest,
Mid cliffs from whence his eagle eye,
For many a league, his prey could spy ;
Cliffs doubling, on their echoes borne,
The terrors of the robber's horn ;

Cliffs which, for many a later year,
The warbling Doric reed shall hear,
When some sad swain shall teach the grove.
Ambition is no cure for love.

XXVIII.

Unchallenged, thence past Deloraine,
To ancient Riddell's fair domain,
Where Aill, from mountains freed,
Down from the lakes did raving come ;
Each wave was crested with tawny foam,
Like the mane of a chesnut steed.
In vain ! no torrent, deep or broad,
Might bar the bold moss-trooper's road.

XXIX.

At the first plunge the horse sunk low,
And the water broke o'er the saddle-bow ;
Above the foaming tide, I ween,
Scarce half the charger's neck was seen ;
For he was barded from counter to tail,
And the rider was armed complete in mail ;
Never heavier man and horse
Stemmed a midnight torrent's force ;
The warrior's very plume, I say,
Was daggled by the dashing spray ;
Yet through good heart, and our ladye's grace,
At length he gained the landing place.

XXX.

Now Bowden Moor the march-man won,
And sternly shook his plumed head,
As glanced his eye o'er Halidon ;
For on his soul the slaughter red,
Of that unballowed morn arose,
When first the Scott and car were foes ;
When royal James beheld the fray,
Prize to the victor of the day ;
When Home and Douglas, in the van,
Bore down Buccleuch's retiring clan,
Till gallant Cessford's heart-blood dear
Reeked on dark Elliot's Border spear.

XXXI.

In bitter mood he spurred fast,
And soon the hated heath was past ;
And far beneath, in lustre wan,
Old Melros' rose, and fair Tweed ran ;
Like some tall rock, with lichens gray,
Seemed, dimly huge, the dark Abbaye.
When Hawick he passed, had curfew rung,
Now midnight lauds were in Melrose sung.
The sound upon the fitful gale,
In solemn wise, did rise and fall,
Like that wild harp, whose magic tone
Is wakened by the winds alone ;
But when Melrose he reached, 'twas silence
all ;
He meety stabled his steed in stall,
And sought the convent's lonely wall.

HERE paused the harp ; and with its swell
The master's fire and courage fell :
Dejectedly, and low, he bowed,
And, gazing timid on the crowd,
He seemed to seek, in every eye,
If they approved his minstrelsy ;

And, diffident of present praise,
Somewhat he spoke of former days,
And how old age, and wandering long,
Had done his hand and harp some wrong,

The duchess, and her daughters fair,
And every gentle lady there,
Each after each, in due degree,
Gave praises to his melody ;
His hand was true, his voice was clear,
And much they longed the rest to hear.
Encouraged thus, the aged man,
After meet rest, again began.

Canto Second.

IF thou would'st view fair Melrose aright,
Go visit it by the pale moon-light ;
For the gay beams of lightsome day
Gild, but to flout, the ruins gray.
When the broken arches are black in night,
And each shafted oriel glimmers white ;
When the cold light's uncertain shower
Streams on the ruined central tower ;
When buttress and buttress, alternately,
Seem framed of ebony and ivory ;
When silver edges the imagery,
And the scrolls that teach thee to live and die ;
When distant Tweed is heard to rave,
And the owl to hoot o'er the dead man's grave ;
Then go—but go alone the while—
Then view St. David's ruined pile ;
And, home returning, soothly swear,
Was never scene so sad and fair !

II.

Short halt did Deloraine make there ;
Little recked he of the scene so fair.
With dagger's hilt, on the wicket strong,
He struck full loud, and struck full long.
The porter hurried to the gate—
“ Who knocks so loud, and knocks so late ? ”
“ From Branksome I,” the warrior cried ;
And strait the wicket opened wide :
For Branksome's chiefs had in battle stood,
To fence the rights of fair Melrose ;
And lands and livings, many a rood,
Had gifted the shrine for their souls repose.

III.

Bold Deloraine his errand said ;
The porter bent his humble head ;
With torch in hand, and foot unshod,
And noiseless step the path he trod ;
The arched cloisters, far and wide,
Rang to the warrior's clanking stride ;
Till, stooping low his lofty crest,
He entered the cell of the ancient priest,
And lifted his barred aventayle,
To hail the monk of St. Mary's aisle.

IV.

“ The ladye of Branksome greets thee by me ;
Says, that the fated hour is come,
And that to-night I shall watch with thee,
To win the treasure of the tomb.”

From sackcloth couch the monk arose,
With toil his stiffened limbs he reared ;
A hundred years had flung their snows
On his thin locks and floating beard.

V.

And strangely on the knight looked he,
And his blue eyes gleamed wild and wide ;
“ And, darest thou, warrior ! seek to see,
What heaven and hell alike would hide ?
My breast, in belt of iron pent,
With shirt of hair and scourge of thorn ;
For threescore years, in penance spent.
My knees those flinty stones have worn :
Yet all too little to atone
For knowing what should ne’er be known.
Wouldst thou thy every future year
In ceaseless prayer and penance dree,
Yet wait thy latter end with fear—
Then, daring warrior, follow me !”

VI.

“ Penance, father, will I none ;
Prayer know I hardly one ;
For mass or prayer can I rarely tarry,
Save to patten an Ave Mary,
When I ride on a Border foray :
Other prayer can I none ;
So speed me my errand, and let me begone.”

VII.

Again on the knight looked the churchman old,
And again he sighed heavily ;
For he had himself been a warrior bold,
And fought in Spain and Italy.
And he thought on the days were long since bye,
When his limbs were strong, and his courage was high ;
Now, slow and faint, he led the way,
Where, cloistered round, the garden lay ;
The pillared arches were over their head,
And beneath their feet were the bones of the dead.

VIII.

Spreading herbs and flowerets bright,
Glistened with the dew of night ;
Nor herb nor floweret glistened there,
But was carved in the cloister arches as fair.
The monk gazed long on the lovely moon,
Then into the night he looked forth ;
And red and bright the streamers light
Were dancing in the glowing north.
So had he seen, in fair Castile,
The youth in glittering squadrons start ;
Sudden the flying jennet wheel,
And hurl the unexpected dart.
He knew, by the streamers that shot so bright,
That spirits were riding the northern light.

IX.

By a steel-clenched postern door,
They entered now the chancel tall ;
The darkened roof rose high aloof
On pillars lofty, and light, and small ;
The keystone, that locked each ribbed aisle,
Was a fleur-de-lys, or a quatre-feuille ;
The corbells were carved grotesque and grim ;
And the pillars, with clustered shafts so trim,

With plinth and with capital flourished around,
Seemed bundles of lances which garlands had bound.

X.

Full many a scutcheon and banner, riven,
Shook to the cold night-wind of heaven,
Around the screened altar’s pale ;
And there the dying lamps did burn,
Before thy low and lonely urn,
O gallant chief of Otterburne,
And thine, dark knight of Liddesdale !
O fading honours of the dead !
O high ambition, lowly laid !

XI.

The moon on the east oriel shone,
Through slender shafts of shapely stone,
By foliated tracery combined ;
Thou wouldst have thought some fairy’s hand,
’Twixt poplars straight, the osier wand,
In many a freakish knot, had twined ;
Then framed a spell, when the work was done,
And changed the willow wreaths to stone.
The silver light, so pale and faint,
Shewed many a prophet and many a saint,
Whose image on the glass was dyed ;
Full in the midst, his cross of red
Triumphant Michael brandished.

And trampled the apostate’s pride.
The moon-beam kissed the holy pane,
And threw on the pavement a bloody stain.

XII.

They sate them down on a marble stone
(A Scottish monarch slept below) ;
Thus spoke the monk, in solemn tone—
“ I was not always a man of woe ;
For Paynim countries I have trod,
And fought beneath the cross of God :
Now strange, to my eyes thine arms appear,
And their iron clung sounds strange to my ear.

XIII.

“ In these far climes, it was my lot
To meet the wondrous Michael Scott ;
A wizard of such dreaded fame,
That when, in Salamanca’s cave,
Him listed his magic wand to wave,
The bells would ring in Notre Dame !
Some of his skill he taught to me ;
And, warrior, I could say to thee,
The words that clove Eildon hills in three,
And bridled the Tweed with a curb of stone :
But to speak them were a deadly sin ; [in,
And for having but thought them my heart with-
A treble penance must be done.

XIV.

“ When Michael lay on his dying bed,
His conscience was awakened ;
He bethought him of his sinful deed,
And he gave me a sign to come with speed :
I was in Spain when the morning rose,
But I stood by his bed ere evening close.
The words may not again be said,
That he spoke to me, on death-bed laid ;
They would rend this Abbaye’s masonry nave,
And pile it in heaps above his grave.

XV.

"I swore to bury his mighty book,
That never mortal might therein look;
And never to tell where it was hid,
Save at his chief of Branksome's need;
And when that need was past and o'er,
Again the volume to restore.
I buried him on St. Michael's night, [bright;
When the bell tolled one, and the moon was
And I dug his chamber among the dead,
Where the floor of the chancel was stained red,
That his patron's cross might over him wave,
And scare the fiends from the wizard's grave.

XVI.

"It was a night of woe and dread,
When Michael in the tomb I laid!
Strange sounds along the chancel past;
The banners waved without a blast"— [one!—
—Still spoke the monk, when the bell tolled
I tell you, that a braver man
Than William of Deloraine, good at need,
Against a foe ne'er spurred a steed;
Yet somewhat was he chilled with dread,
And his hair did bristle upon his head.

XVII.

"Lo, warrior! now the cross of red
Points to the grave of the mighty dead;
With in it burns a wondrous light,
To chase the spirits that love the night:
That lamp shall burn unquenchably,
Until the eternal doom shall be."
Slow moved the monk to the broad flag-stone,
Which the bloody cross was traced upon:
He pointed to a secret nook;
A bar from thence the warrior took; [hand,
And the monk made a sign with his withered
The grave's huge portal to expand.

XVIII.

With beating heart, to the task he went:
His sinewy frame o'er the grave-stone bent;
With bar of iron heaved amain,
Till the toil-drops fell from his brows like rain.
It was by dint of passing strength,
That he moved the massy stone at length.
I would you had been there to see,
How the light broke forth so gloriously;
Streamed upward to the chancel roof,
And through the galleries far aloof!
No earthly flame blazed e'er so bright:
It shone like heaven's own blessed light;

And, issuing from the tomb,
Shewed the monk's cowl, and visage pale;
Danced on the dark-brow'd warrior's mail,
And kissed his waving plume.

XIX.

Before their eyes the wizard lay,
As if he had not been dead a day;
His hoary beard in silver rolled,
He seemed some seventy winters old;
A palmer's amice wrapped him round,
With a wrought Spanish baldrick bound,
Like a pilgrim from beyond the sea:
His left hand held his book of might;

A silver cross was in his right;
The lamp was placed beside his knee:
High and majestic was his look,
At which the fellest fiends had shook;
And all unruffled was his face—
They trusted his soul had gotten grace.

XX.

Often had William of Deloraine
Rode through the battle's bloody plain,
And trampled down the warriors slain,
And neither known remorse or awe;
Yet now remorse and awe he own'd;
His breath came thick, his head swam round,
When this strange scene of death he saw.
Bewildered and unnerved, he stood,
And the priest prayed fervently, and loud;
With eyes averted, prayed he,
He might not endure the sight to see,
Of the man he had loved so brotherly.

XXI.

And when the priest his death-prayer had prayed,
Thus unto Deloraine he said—
"Now speed thee what thou hast to do,
Or, warrior, we may dearly rue;
For those, thou mayest not look upon,
Are gathering fast round the yawning stone!"—
Then Deloraine, in terror, took
From the cold hand the mighty book,
With iron clasped, and with iron bound:
He thought, as he took it, the dead man frowned;
But the glare of the sepulchral light,
Perchance, had dazzled the warrior's sight.

XXII.

When the huge stone sunk o'er the tomb,
The night returned, in double gloom;
For the moon had gone down, and the stars
were few;

And, as the knight and priest withdrew,
With wavering steps, and dizzy brain,
They hardly might the postern gain.
'Tis said, as through the aisles they passed,
They heard strange noises on the blast;
And through the cloister-galleries small,
Which at mid-height thread the chancel wall,
Loud sobs, and laughter louder, ran,
And voices unlike the voice of man;
As if the fiends kept holiday,
Because these spells were brought to day.
I cannot tell how the truth may be;
I say the tale as 'twas said to me.

XXIII.

"Now hie thee hence," the father said;
"And when we are on death-bed laid,
O may our dear ladye, and sweet St. John,
Forgive our souls for the deed we have done!"
The monk returned him to his cell,

And many a prayer and penance sped;
When the convent met at the noontide bell—
The monk of St. Mary's aisle was dead!
Before the cross was the body laid,
With hands clasped fast, as if still he prayed.

XXIV.

The knight breathed free in the morning wind;
And strove his hardihood to find:

He was glad when he passed the tombstones
gray.

Which girdle round the fair Abbaye ;
For the mystic book, to his bosom prest,
Felt like a load upon his breast ;
And his joints, with nerves of iron twined,
Shook, like the aspen leaves in wind :
Full fain was he when the dawn of day
Began to brighten Cheviot gray ;
He joyed to see the cheerful light,
And he said Ave Mary, as well as he might.

XXV.

The sun had brightened Cheviot gray,
The sun had brightened the Carter's side ;
And soon beneath the rising day
Smiled Branksome towers and Teviot's tide.
The wild birds told their warbling tale,
And wakened every flower that blows ;
And peeped forth the violet pale,
And spread her breast the mountain rose :
And lovelier than the rose so red,
Yet paler than the violet pale,
She early left her sleepless bed,
The fairest maid of Teviotdale.

XXVI.

Why does fair Margaret so early awake,
And don her kirtle so hastily ;
And the silken knots which in hurry she would make,

Why tremble her slender fingers to tie ;
Why does she stop, and look often around,
As she glides down the secret stair ;
And why does she pat the shaggy blood-hound,
As he rouses him up from his lair ;
And though she passes the postern alone,
Why is not the watchman's bugle blown !

XXVII.

The ladye steps in doubt and dread,
Lest her watchful mother hear her tread ;
The ladye caresses the rough blood-hound,
Lest his voice should waken the castle round ;
The watchman's bugle is not blown,
For he was her foster-father's son ;
And she glides through the greenwood at dawn
of light.

To meet Baron Henry, her own true knight.

XXVIII.

The knight and ladye fair are met,
And under the hawthorn's boughs are set.
A fairer pair were never seen
To meet beneath the hawthorn green.
He was stately, and young, and tall ;
Dreaded in battle, and loved in hall :
And she, when love, scarce told, scarce hid,
Lent to her cheek a livelier red ;
When the half-sigh her swelling breast
Against the silken ribband pressed ;
When her blue eyes their secret told,
Though shaded by her locks of gold—
Where would you find the peerless fair
With Margaret of Branksome might compare !

XXIX.

And now, fair dames, methinks I see
You listen to my minstrelsy ;

Your waving locks ye backward throw,
And sidelong bend your necks of snow—
Ye ween to hear a tender tale
Of two true lovers in a dale ;

And how the knight, with tender fire,
To paint his faithful passion, strove ;
Swore, he might at her feet expire,
But never, never cease to love ;
And how she blushed, and how she sighed,
And, half consenting, half denied,
And said that she would die a maid—
Yet, might the bloody feud be stayed,
Henry of Cranstoun. And only he,
Margaret of Branksome's choice should be.

XXX.

Alas ! fair dames, your hopes are vain !
My harp has lost the enchanting strain ;
Its lightness would my age reprove :
My hairs are gray, my limbs are old,
My heart is dead, my veins are cold—
I may not, must not, sing of love.

XXXI.

Beneath an oak, mossed o'er by eld,
The Baron's dwarf his courser held,
And held his crested helm and spear.
That dwarf was scarcely an earthly man,
If the tales were true that of him ran Through all the Border, far and near.
'Twas said, when the Baron a hunting rode,
Through Reeddale's glens, but rarely trod,
He heard a voice cry, " Lost ! lost ! lost !"
And, like tennis-ball by racket tossed,
A leap, of thirty feet and three,
Made from the gorse this elfin shape,
Distorted like some dwarfish ape,
And lighted at Lord Cranstoun's knee.
Lord Cranstoun was some whit dismayed ;
'Tis said that five good miles he rode,
To rid him of his company ;
But where he rode one mile, the dwarf ran four.

And the dwarf was first at the castle door.

XXXII.

Use lessens marvel, it is said,
This elvish dwarf with the Baron staid ;
Little he eat, and less he spoke,
Nor mingled with the menial flock ;
And oft apart his arms he tossed,
And often muttered, " Lost ! lost ! lost !"
He was waspish, arch, and litherlie,
But well Lord Cranstoun served he :
And he of his service was full fain ;
For once he had been ta'en or slain,
An' it had not been his ministry.
All, between Home and Hermitage,
Talked of Lord Cranstoun's goblin page.

XXXIII.

For the Baron went on pilgrimage,
And took with him this elfish page,
To Mary's chapel of the Lowes :
For there, beside our Ladye's lake,
An offering he had sworn to make,
And he would pay his vows.
But the Ladye of Branksome gathered a band

Of the best that would ride at her command ;

The trysting place was Newark Lee.

Wat of Harden came thither amain,

And thither came John of Thirlestaine,

And thither came William of Deloraine ;

They were three hundred spears and three.

Through Douglas-burn, up Yarrow stream,

Their horses prance, their lances gleam.

They came to St. Mary's lake ere day ;

But the chapel was void, and the Baron away.

They burned the chapel for very rage,

And cursed Lord Cranstoun's goblin page.

XXXIV.

And now, in Branksome's good green wood,

As under the aged oak he stood,

The Baron's courser pricks his ears,

As if a distant noise he hears.

The dwarf waves his long lean arm on high,

And signs to the lovers to part and fly ;

No time was then to vow or sigh.

Fair Margaret, through the hazel grove,

Flew like the startled cushat-dove ;

The dwarf the stirrup held and rein ;

Vaulted the knight on his steed amain,

And pondering deep that morning's scene,

Rode eastward through the hawthorn's green.

While thus he poured the lengthened tale,

The Minstrel's voice began to fail :

Full slyly smiled the observant page,

And gave the withered hand of age

A goblet, crowned with mighty wine,

The blood of Velez' scorched vine.

He raised the silver cup on high,

And, while the big drop filled his eye,

Prayed God to bless the Duchess long,

And all who cheered a son of song.

The attending maidens smiled to see,

How long, how deep, how zealously,

The precious juice the Minstrel quaffed ;

And he, emboldened by the draught,

Looked gaily back to them, and laughed.

The cordia nectar of the bowl

Swelled his old veins, and cheered his soul ;

A lighter, livelier prelude ran,

Ere thus his tale again began.

Canto Third.

I.

And said I that my limbs were old ;

And said : that my blood was cold,

And that my kindly fire was fled,

And my poor withered heart was dead,

And that I might not sing of love !—

How could I, to the dearest theme,

That ever warmed a minstrel's dream,

So foul, so false, a recreant prove !

How could I name love's very name,

Nor wake my harp to notes of flame !

II.

In peace, Love tunes the shepherd's reed ;

In war, he mounts the warrior's steed :

In halls, in gay attire is seen :

In hamlets, dances on the green ;

Love rules the court, the camp, the grove,

And men below, and saints above ;

For love is heaven, and heaven is love.

III.

So thought Lord Cranstoun, as I ween,

While, pondering deep the tender scene,

He rode through Branksome's hawthorn green.

But the page shouted wild and shrill—

And scarce his helmet could he don,

When downward from the shady hill

A stately knight came pricking on.

That warrior's steed, so dapple gray,

Was dark with sweat, and splashed with clay ;

His armour red with many a stain :

He seemed in such a weary plight,

As if he had ridden the live-long night ;

For it was William of Deloraine.

IV.

But no whit weary did he seem,

When, dancing in the sunny beam.

He marked the crane on the Baron's crest ;

For his ready spear was in his rest.

Few were the words, and stern, and high,

That marked the foemen's feudal hate ;

For question fierce, and proud reply,

Gave signal soon of dire debate.

Their very coursers seemed to know

That each was other's mortal foe ;

And snorted fire, when wheeled around,

To give each knight his vantage ground.

V.

In rapid round the Baron bent ;

He sighed a sigh, and prayed a prayer :

The prayer was to his patron saint,

The sigh was to his ladye fair.

Stout Deloraine nor sighed, nor prayed,

Nor saint, nor ladye, called to aid ;

But he stooped his head, and couched his spear,

And spurred his steed to full career.

The meeting of these champions proud

Seemed like the bursting thunder-cloud.

VI.

Stern was the dint the Borderer lent !

The stately Baron backwards bent ;

Bent backwards to his horse's tail,

And his plumes went scattering on the gale ;

The tough ash spear, so stout and true,

Into a thousand flinders flew.

But Cranstoun's lance, of more avail,

Pierced through, like silk, the Borderer's mail ;

Through shield, and jack, and acton, past,

Deep in his bosom, broke at last—

Still sate the warrior saddle-fast,

Till, stumbling in the mortal shock,

Down went the steed, the girthing broke,

Hurled on a heap lay man and horse.

The Baron onward passed his course ;

Nor knew—so giddy rolled his brain—

His foe lay stretched upon the plain.

VII.

But when he reined his coursèr round,

And saw his foeman on the ground

Lie senseless at the bloody clay,
 He bade his page to stanch the wound,
 And there beside the warrior stay,
 And tend him in his doubtful state,
 And lead him to Branksome castle-gate:
 His noble mind was inly moved
 For the kinsman of the maid he loved.
 "This shalt thou do without delay;
 No longer here myself may stay:
 Unless the swifter I speed away,
 Short shrift will be at my dying day."

VIII.

Away in speed Lord Cranstoun rode;
 The goblin-page behind abode:
 His Lord's command he ne'er withstood,
 Though small his pleasure to do good.
 As the corslet off he took,
 The dwarf espied the mighty book!
 Much he marvelled a knight of pride,
 Like a book-bosomed priest, should ride
 He thought not to search or stanch the wound,
 Until the secret he had found.

IX.

The iron band, the iron clasp,
 Resisted long the elfin grasp;
 For when the first he had undone,
 It closed as he the next begun.
 Those iron clasps, that iron band,
 Would not yield to unchristened hand,
 Till he smeared the cover o'er
 With the Borderer's curdled gore;
 A moment then the volume spread,
 And one short spell therein he read.
 It had much of glamour might,
 Could make a ladye seem a knight;
 The cobwebs on a dungeon wall,
 Seem tapestry in lordly hall;
 A nut-shell seem a gilded barge,
 A sheeling seem a palace large,
 And youth seem age, and age seem youth—
 All was delusion, nought was truth.

X.

He had not read another spell,
 When on his cheek a buffet fell,
 So fierce, it stretched him on the plain,
 Beside the wounded Deloraine.
 From the ground he rose dismayed,
 And shook his huge and matted head;
 One word he muttered, and no more—
 "Man of age, thou smittest sore!"
 No more the elfin page durst try
 Into the wonderful book to pry;
 The clasps, though smeared with Christian
 gore,
 Shut faster than they were before.
 He hid it underneath his cloak—
 Now, if you ask who gave the stroke,
 I cannot tell, so not I thrive;
 It was not given by man alive.

XI.

Unwillingly himself he addressed,
 To do his master's high behest:
 He lifted up the living corse,
 And laid it on the weary horse;

He led him into Branksome hall,
 Before the beads of the warders all;
 And each did after swear and say,
 There only passed a load of hay.
 He took him to Lord David's tower,
 Even to the Ladye's secret bower;
 And, but that stronger spells were spread,
 And the door might not be opened,
 He had laid him on her very bed.
 Whate'er he did of gramarye,
 Was always done maliciously.
 He flung the warrior on the ground,
 And the blood welled freshly from the wound.

XII.

As he repassed the outer court,
 He spied the fair young child at sport.
 He thought to train him to the wood;
 For, at a word, be it understood,
 He was always for ill, and never for good.
 Seemed to the boy some comrade gay;
 Led him forth to the woods to play;
 On the draw-bridge the warders stout
 Saw a terrier and lurcher passing out.

XIII.

He led the boy o'er bank and fell,
 Until they came to a woodland brook;
 The running stream dissolved the spell,
 And his own elvish shape he took.
 Could he have had his pleasure vild,
 He had crippled the joints of the noble child;
 Or, with his fingers long and lean,
 Had strangled him, in fiendish spleen:
 But his awful mother he had in dread,
 And also his power was limited;
 So he but scowled on the startled child,
 And darted through the forest wild;
 The woodland brook he bounding crossed,
 And laughed and shouted, "Lost! lost! lost!"

XIV.

Full sore amazed at the wonderous change,
 And frightened, as a child might be,
 At the wild yell and visage strange,
 And the dark words of gramarye,
 The child, amid the forest bower,
 Stood rooted like a lilye flower;
 And when at length, with trembling pace,
 He sought to find where Branksome lay,
 He feared to see that grisly face
 Glare from some thicket on his way.
 Thus, starting off, he journeyed on,
 And deeper in the wood is gone;
 For aye the more he sought his way,
 The farther still he went astray,
 Until he heard the mountains round
 Ring to the baying of a hound.

XV.

And hark! and hark! the deep-mouthed bark
 Comes nigher still, and nigher;
 Bursts on the path a dark blood-hound,
 His tawny muzzle tracked the ground,
 And his red eye shot fire.
 Soon as the wildered child saw he,
 He flew at him right furiously.
 I ween you would have seen with joy

The bearing of the gallant boy,
 When, worthy of his noble sire,
 His wet cheek glowed 'twixt fear and ire !
 He faced the blood-hound manfully,
 And held his little bat on high ;
 So fierce he struck, the dog, afraid,
 At cautious distance hoarsely bayed,
 But still in act to spring ;
 When dashed an archer through the glade,
 And when he saw the hound was stayed,
 He drew his tough bow-string ;
 But a rough voice cried, " Shoot not, hoy !
 Ho ! shoot not, Edward—'tis a boy !"——

XVI.

The speaker issued from the wood,
 And chuckled his fellow's surly mood,
 And quelled the ban-dog's ire.
 He was an English yeoman good,
 And born in Lancashire ;
 Well could he hit a fallow deer
 Five hundred feet him fro ;
 With hand more true, and eye more clear,
 No archer bended bow.
 His coal-black hair, shorn round and close,
 Set off his sun-burned face ;
 Old England's sign, St. George's cross,
 His barret-cap did grace ;
 His eagle horn, hung by his side,
 All in a wolf-skin baldrick tied ;
 And his short faulchion, sharp and clear,
 Had pierced the throat of many a deer.

XVII.

His kirtle, made of forest green,
 Reached scantily to his knee ;
 And at his belt, of arrows keen
 A furbished sheaf bore he ;
 His buckler scarce in breadth a span,
 No larger fence had he ;
 He never counted him a man,
 Would strike below the knee ;
 His slackened bow was in his hand,
 And the leash that was his blood-hound's band.

XVIII.

He would not do the fair child harm,
 But held him with his powerful arm,
 That he might neither fight nor flee ;
 For when the red-cross spied he,
 The boy strove long and violently.
 " Now, by St. George," the archer cries,
 " Edward, methinks, we have a prize !
 This boy's fair face, and courage free,
 Shews he is come of high degree."

XIX.

" Yes ! I am come of high degree,
 For I am the heir of bold Buccleuch ;
 And if thou dost not set me free,
 False Suthron, thou shalt dearly rue !
 For Walter of Harden shall come with speed,
 And William of Deloraine, good at need,
 And every Scott from Eske to Tweed ;
 And if thou dost not let me go,
 Despite thy arrows and thy bow,
 I'll have thee hanged, to feed the crow !"

XX.

" Gramercy, for thy good will, fair boy !
 My mind was never set so high ;
 But if thou art chief of such a clan,
 And art the son of such a man,
 And ever comest to thy command,
 Our wardens had need to keep good order :
 My bow of yew to a hazel wand,
 Thou'lt make them work upon the Border.
 Meantime, be pleased to come with me,
 For good Lord Dacre shalt thou see ;
 I think our work is well begun,
 When we have taken thy father's son."

XXI.

Although the child was led away,
 In Branksome still he seemed to stay.
 For so the dwarf his part did play ;
 And in the shape of that young boy,
 He wrought the castle much annoy.
 The comrades of the young Buccleuch
 He pinched, and beat, and overthrew ;
 Nay, some of them he well nigh slew.
 He tore Dame Maudlin's silken tire ;
 And as Sym Hall stood by the fire,
 He lighted the match of his bandelier,
 And woefully scorched the hackbutteer.
 It may be hardly thought, or said,
 The mischief that the urchin made,
 Till many of the castle guessed
 That the young Baron was possessed !

XXII.

Well I ween the charm he held
 The noble Ladye had soon dispelled ;
 But she was deeply busied then
 To tend the wounded Deloraine.
 Much she wondered to find him lie,
 On the stone threshold, stretched along ;
 She thought some spirit of the sky
 Had done the bold moss-trooper wrong ;
 Because, despite her precept dread,
 Perchance he in the book had read ;
 But the broken lance in his bosom stood,
 And it was earthly steel and wood.

XXIII.

She drew the splinter from the wound,
 And with a charm she stanch'd the blood ;
 She bade the gash be cleansed and bound ;
 No longer by his couch she stood ;
 But she has ta'en the broken lance,
 And washed it from the clotted gore,
 And salved the splinter o'er and o'er.
 William of Deloraine, in trance,
 Whene'er she turned it round and round,
 Twisted, as if she galled his wound.

Then to her maidens she did say,
 That he should be whole man and sound,
 Within the course of a night and day.
 Full long she toiled ; for she did rue
 Mishap to friend so stout and true.

XXIV.

So passed the day—the evening fell,
 'Twas near the time of curfew bell ;
 The air was mild, the wind was calm,
 The stream was smooth, the dew was balm ;

E'en the rude watchman, on the tower,
 Enjoyed and blessed the lovely hour.
 Far more fair Margaret loved and blessed
 The hour of silence and of rest.
 On the high turret, sitting lone,
 She waked at times the lute's soft tone ;
 Touched a wild note, and all between
 Thought of the bower of hawthorn's green ;
 Her golden hair streamed free from band,
 Her fair cheek rested on her hand,
 Her blue eye saw the west afar,
 For lovers love the western star.

XXV.

Is yon the star o'er Penchryst-Pen,
 That rises slowly to her ken,
 And, spreading broad its wavering light,
 Shakes its loose tresses on the night ?
 Is yon red glare the western star ? —
 O 'tis the beacon-blaze of war !
 Scarce could she draw her tightened breath ;
 For well she knew the fire of death !

XXVI.

The warder viewed it blazing strong,
 And blew his war-note loud and long,
 Till, at the high and haughty sound,
 Rock, wood, and river, rung around ;
 The blast alarmed the festal hall.
 And startled forth the warriors all ;
 Far downward, in the castle-yard,
 Full many a torch and cresset glared ;
 And helms and plumes, confusedly tossed,
 Were in the blaze half-seen, half-lost ;
 And spears in wild disorder shook,
 Like reeds beside a frozen brook.

XXVII.

The Seneschal, whose silver hair
 Was reddened by the torches' glare,
 Stood in the midst, with gesture proud,
 And issued forth his mandates loud—
 " On Penchryst glows a bale of fire,
 And three are kindling on Priestthaughswire ;
 Ride out, ride out,
 The foe to scout !

Mount, mount for Branksome, every man !
 Thou, Todrig, warn the Johnstone clan,
 That ever are true and stout—
 Ye need not send to Liddesdale ;
 For when they see the blazing hale,
 Elliots and Armstrongs never fail—
 Ride, Alton, ride, for death and life !
 And warn the Warden of the strife.
 Young Gilbert, let our beacon blaze,
 Our kin, and clan, and friends, to raise."—

XXVIII.

Fair Margaret, from the turret head,
 Heard, far below, the coursers' tread,
 While loud the harness rung,
 As to their seats, with clamour dread,
 The ready horsemen sprung ;
 And trampling hoofs, and iron coats,
 And leaders' voices, mingled notes,
 And out ! and out !
 In hasty route,
 The horsemen galloped forth ;

Dispersing to the south to scout,
 And east, and west, and north,
 To view their coming enemies,
 And warn their vassals and allies.

XXIX.

The ready page, with hurried hand,
 Awaked the need-fire's slumbering brand,
 And ruddy blushed the heaven :
 For a sheet of flame from the turret high
 Waved like a blood-flag on the sky,
 All flaring and uneven ;
 And soon a score of fires, I ween,
 From height, and hill, and cliff were seen ;
 Each with warlike tidings fraught ;
 Each from each the signal caught ;
 Each after each they glanced to sight.
 As stars arise upon the night.
 They gleamed on many a dusky tarn,
 Haunted by the lonely earn ;
 On many a Cairn's gray pyramid,
 Where urns of mighty chiefs lie hid ;
 Till high Dunedin the blazes saw,
 From Soltra and Dumpender law ;
 And Lothian heard the regent's order,
 That all should bowne them for the Border.

XXX.

The livelong night in Branksome rang
 The ceaseless sound of steel ;
 The castle-bell, with backward clang,
 Sent forth the larum peal ;
 Was frequent heard the heavy jar,
 Where massy stone and iron bar
 Were piled on echoing keep and tower,
 To whelm the foe with deadly shower ;
 Was frequent heard the changing guard,
 And watch-word from the sleepless ward ;
 While, wearied by the endless din,
 Blood-hound and ban-dog yelled within.

XXXI.

The noble dame, amid the broil,
 Shared the gray Seneschal's high toil,
 And spoke of danger with a smile ;
 Cheered the young knights, and council sage
 Held with the chiefs of riper age.
 No tidings of the foe were brought,
 Nor of his numbers knew they ought,
 Nor what in time of truce he sought.

Some said that there were thousands ten ;
 And others weened that it was nought,

But Leven clans, or Tynedale men,
 Who came to gather in black mail ;
 And Liddisdale, with small avail,
 Might drive them lightly back agen.

So passed the anxious night away,
 And welcome was the peep of day.

CEASED the high sound—the listening throng
 Applaud the master of the song ;
 And marvel much, in helpless age,
 So hard should be his pilgrimage.
 Had he no friend—no daughter dear,
 His wandering toil to share and cheer ;
 No son, to be his father's stay,
 And guide him on the rugged way ?—

"Aye! once he had—but he was dead!"—
 Upon the harp he stooped his head,
 And busied himself the strings withal,
 To hide the tear that fain would fall.
 In solemn measure, soft and slow,
 Arose a father's notes of woe.

Canto Fourth.

I.

SWEET Teviot! on thy silver tide,
 The glaring bale-fires blaze no more;
 No longer steel-clad warriors ride
 Along thy wild and willowed shore;
 Where'er thou wind'st by dale or hill,
 All, all is peaceful, all is still,
 As if thy waves, since Time was born,
 Since first they rolled their way to Tweed,
 Had only heard the shepherd's reed,
 Nor started at the bugle-horn.

II.

Unlike the tide of human time,
 Which, though it change in ceaseless flow,
 Retains each grief, retains each crime,
 Its earliest course was doomed to know;
 And, darker as it downward bears,
 Is stained with past and present tears.
 Low as that tide has ebb'd with me,
 It still reflects to memory's eye
 The hour, my brave, my only boy,
 Fell by the side of great Dundee.
 Why, when the volleying musket played
 Against the bloody Highland blade,
 Why was not I beside him laid!—
 Enough—he died the death of fame;
 Enough—he died with conquering Græme.

III.

Now over Border dale and fell,
 Full wide and far, was terror spread;
 For pathless marsh, and mountain cell,
 The peasant left his lowly shed.
 The frightened flocks and herds were pent
 Beneath the peel's rude battlement;
 And maids and matrons dropped the tear,
 While ready warriors seized the spear.
 From Branksome's towers, the watchman's eye
 Dun wreaths of distant smoke can spy,
 Which, curling in the rising sun,
 Shewed southern ravage was begun.

IV.

Now loud the heedful gate-ward cried—
 "Prepare ye all for blows and blood!
 Wat Tinnlinn, from the Liddle-side,
 Comes wading through the flood.
 Full oft the Tynedale snatchers knock
 At his lone gate, and prove the lock;
 It was but last St. Barnabright
 They sieged him a whole summer night,
 But fled at morning; well they knew,
 In vain he never twanged the yew.
 Right sharp has been the evening shower,
 That drove him from his Liddle tower;
 And, by my faith," the gate-ward said,
 "I think 'twill prove a warden-raid."

V.

While thus he spoke, the bold yeoman
 Entered the echoing barbican.
 He led a small and shaggy nag,
 That through a bog, from hag to hag,
 Could bound like any Bilhope stag;
 It bore his wife and children twain;
 A half-clothed serf was all their train:
 His wife, stout, ruddy, and dark-browed,
 Of silver broach and bracelet proud,
 Laughed to her friends among the crowd.
 He was of stature passing tall,
 But sparely formed, and lean withal;
 A battered marion on his brow;
 A leathern jack, as fence enow,
 On his broad shoulders loosely hung;
 A border-axe behind was slung;
 His spear, six Scottish ells in length,
 Seemed newly dyed with gore;
 His shafts and bow, of wondrous strength,
 His hardy partner bore.

VI.

Thus to the ladye did Tinnlinn shew
 The tidings of the English foe—
 "Belted Will Howard is marching here,
 And hot Lord Dacre, with many a spear,
 And all the German hagbut-men,
 Who long have lain at Askerten:
 They crossed the Liddle at curfew hour,
 And burned my little lonely tower;
 The fiend receive their souls therefor!
 It had not been burned this year and more.
 Barn-yard and dwelling, blazing bright,
 Served to guide me on my flight;
 But I was chased the live-long night.
 Black John of Akeshaw, and Fergus Græme,
 Fast upon my traces came,
 Until I turned at Priesthaugh-Scrogg,
 And shot their horses in the bog,
 Slew Fergus with my lance outright;
 I had him long at high despite:
 He drove my cows last Pastern's night."

VII.

Now weary scouts from Liddesdale,
 Fast hurrying in, confirmed the tale;
 As far as they could judge by ken,
 Three hours would bring to Teviot's strand
 Three thousand armed Englishmen—
 Meanwhile, full many a warlike band,
 From Teviot, Aill, and Ettrick's shade,
 Came in, their chief's defence to aid.

VIII.

From fair St. Mary's silver wave,
 From dreary Gamescleuch's dusky height,
 His ready lances, Thirlestane brave
 Arrayed beneath a banner bright.
 The tressured fleur-de-luce he claims
 To wreath his shield, since royal James,
 Encamped by Fala's mossy wave,
 The proud distinction grateful gave,
 For faith mid feudal jars;
 What time, save Thirlestane alone,
 Of Scotland's stubborn barons none
 Would march to southern wars;

And hence, in fair remembrance worn,
Yon sheaf of spears his crest has borne;
Hence his high motto shines revealed,
"Ready, aye ready," for the field.

IX

An aged knight, to danger steeled,
With many a moss-trooper, came on;
And azure in a golden field,
The stars and crescent graced his shield,
Without the bend of Murdieston.
Wide lay his lands round Oakwood tower,
And wide round haunted Castle-Ower;
High over Borthwick's mountain flood,
His wood-embosomed mansion stood;
In the dark glen, so deep below,
The herds of plundered England low;
His bold retainers' daily food,
And bought with danger, blows, and blood.
Marauding chief! his sole delight
The moonlight raid, the morning fight;
Not even the Flower of Yarrow's charms,
In youth might tame his rage for arms;
And still in age he spurned at rest,
And still his brows the helmet pressed;
Albeit the blanched locks below
Were white as Dinlay's spotless snow;
Five stately warriors drew the sword
Before their father's band;
A braver knight than Harden's lord
Ne'er belted on a brand.

X.

Whitslade the Hawk, and Headshaw came,
And warriors more than I may name;
But better hearts o'er Border sod
To siege or rescue never rode.
The ladye marked the aids come in,
And high her heart of pride arose;
She bade her youthful son attend,
That he might know his father's friend,
And learn to face his father's foes.
"The boy is ripe to look on war;
I saw him draw a cross-bow stiff,
And his true arrow struck afar
The raven's nest upon the cliff;
The red cross, on a southern breast,
Is broader than the raven's nest:
Thou, Whitslade, shalt teach him his weapon to wield,
And o'er him hold his father's shield."

XI.

Well may you think the wily page
Cared not to face the ladye sage.
He counterfeited childish fear,
And shrieked, and shed full many a tear,
And moaned and plained in manner wild,
The attendants to the ladye told,
Some fairy, sure, had changed the child,
That wont to be so free and bold.
Then wrathful was the noble dame;
She blushed blood-red for very shame—
"Hence! ere the clan his faintness view;
Hence with the weakling to Buccleuch;
Watt Tinlinn, thou shalt be his guide
To Rangleburn's lonely side.

Sure some fell fiend has cursed our line,
That coward should ere be son of mine!"

XII.

A heavy task Watt Tinlinn had,
To guide the counterfeited lad.
Soon as his palfrey felt the weight
Of that ill-omen'd elvish freight,
He bolted, sprung, and reared amain,
Nor heeded bit, nor curb, nor rein.
It cost Wat Tinlinn mickle toil
To drive him but a Scottish mile;
But, as a shallow brook they crossed,
The elf, amid the running stream,
His figure changed, like form in dream.
And fled, and shouted, "Lost! lost! lost!"
Full fast the urchin ran and laughed,
But faster still a cloth-yard shaft
Whistled from startled Tinlinn's yew,
And pierced his shoulder through and through.
Although the imp might not be slain,
And though the wound soon healed again
Yet, as he ran, he yelled for pain;
And Wat of Tinlinn, much aghast,
Rode back to Brauksome fiery fast.

XIII.

Soon on the hill's steep verge he stood,
That look's o'er Branksome's towers and wood;
And martial murmurs, from below,
Proclaimed the approaching southern foe.
Through the dark wood, in mingled tone,
Were border-pipes and bugles blown;
The coursers neighing he could ken,
And measured tread of marching men;
While broke at times the solemn hum,
The Almayn's sullen kettle-drum;
And banners tall, of crimson sheen,
Above the copse appear;
And, glistering through the hawthorns green,
Shine helm, and shield, and spear.

XIV.

Light forayers first, to view the ground,
Spurred their fleet coursers loosely round;
Behind, in close array and fast,
The Kendale archers, all in green,
Obedient to the bugle-blast,
Advancing from the wood, were seen.
To back and guard the archer band,
Lord Dacre's bill-men were at hand;
A hardy race, on lathing bred,
With kirtles white, and crosses red,
Arrayed beneath the banner tall,
That streamed o'er Acre's conquered wall;
And minstrels, as they marched in order,
Played "Noble Lord Dacre, he dwells on the border."

XV.

Behind the English bill and bow,
The mercenaries, firm and slow,
Moved on to fight, in dark array,
By Conrad led of Wolfenstein,
Who brought the band from distant Rhine,
And sold their blood for foreign pay.
The camp their home, their law the sword,
They knew no country, owned no lord;

They were not armed like England's sons,
But bore the levin-darting guns ;
Buff-coats, all frounced and 'broidered o'er,
And morsing-horns and scarfs they wore ;
Each better knee was bared, to aid
The warriors in the escalade ;
All, as they marched, in rugged tongue,
Songs of Teutonic feuds they sung.

XVI.

But louder still the clamour grew,
And louder still the minstrels blew,
When, from beneath the greenwood tree,
Rode forth Lord Howard's chivalry ;
His men at arms, with glaive and spear,
Brought up the battle's glittering rear.
There many a youthful knight, full keen
To gain his spurs, in arms was seen ;
With favour in his crest, or glove,
Memorial of his ladye-love.
So rode they forth in fair array,
Till full their lengthened lines display ;
Then called a halt, and made a stand,
And cried, " St. George, for merry England ! "

XVII.

Now every English eye, intent,
On Branksome's armed towers was bent ;
So near they were, that they might know
The straining harsh of each cross-bow ;
On battlement and bartizan
Gleamed axe, and spear, and partizan ;
Falcon and culver on each tower
Stood prompt, their deadly hail to shower ;
And flashing armour frequent broke
From eddying whirls of sable smoke,
Where, upon tower and turret head,
The seething pitch and molten lead
Reeked, like a witch's cauldron red.
While yet they gaze, the bridges fall,
The wicket opes, and from the wall,
Rides forth the hoary Seneschal.

XVIII.

Armed he rode all save the head,
His white beard o'er his breast-plate spread ;
Unbroke by age, erect his seat,
He ruled his eager courser's gait ;
Forced him, with chastened fire, to prance,
And, high curvetting, slow advance ;
In sign of truce, his better hand
Displayed a peeled willow wand ;
His squire, attending in the rear,
Bore high a gauntlet on a spear.
When they espied him riding out,
Lord Howard and Lord Dacre stout
Sped to the front of their array,
To hear what this old knight should say.

XIX.

" Ye English warden lords, of you
Demands the ladye of Buccleuch,
Why, 'gainst the truce of Border-tide,
In hostile guise, ye dare to ride,
With Kendal bow, and Gilsland brand,
And all yon mercenary band,
Upon the bounds of fair Scotland ?

My ladye reads you swith return ;
And, if but one poor straw you burn, •
Or do our towers so much molest,
Asscare one swallow from her nest,
St. Mary ! but we'll light a brand
Shall warm your hearths in Cumberland."

XX.

A wrathful man was Dacre's lord,
But calmer Howard took the word—
" May't please thy dame, Sir Seneschal,
To seek the castle's outward wall ;
Our pursuivant-at-arms shall shew,
Both why we came, and when we go."
The message sped, the noble dame
To the walls' outward circle came ;
Each chief around leaned on his spear,
To see the pursuivant appear ;
All in Lord Howard's livery dressed,
The lion argent decked his breast.
He led a boy of blooming hue—
O sight to meet a mother's view !
It was the heir of great Buccleuch.
Obeisance meet the herald made,
And thus his master's will he said.

XXI.

" It irks, high dame, my noble lords,
'Gainst ladye fair to draw their swords :
But yet they may not tamely see,
All through the western wardenry,
Your law-contemning kinsmen ride,
And burn and spoil the border-side ;
And ill beseems your rank and birth
To make your towers a flemens-firth.
We claim from thee William of Deloraine,
That he may suffer march-treason pain :
It was but last St. Cuthbert's even
He pricked to Stapleton on Leven,
Harried the lands of Richard Musgrave,
And slew his brother by dint of glaive ;
Then since a lone and widowed dame
These restless riders may not tame,
Either receive within thy towers
Two hundred of my master's powers,
Or straight they sound their warison,
And storm and spoil thy garrison ;
And this fair boy, to London led,
Shall good king Edward's page be bred."

XXII.

He ceased—and loud the boy did cry,
And stretched his little arms on high ;
Implored for aid each well-known face,
And strove to seek the dame's embrace.
A moment changed that ladye's cheer,
Gushed to her eye the unbidden tear ;
She gazed upon the leaders round,
And dark and sad each warrior frowned.
Then, deep within her sobbing breast,
She locked the struggling sigh to rest ;
Unaltered and collected stood,
And thus replied, in dauntless mood.

XXIII.

" Say to thy lords of high emprise,
Who war on women and on boys,
That either William of Deloraine

Will cleanse him, by oath, of march-treason
 stair,
 Or else he will the combat take
 'Gainst Musgrave, for his honour's sake.
 No knight in Cumberland so good,
 But William may count with him kin and
 blood ;

Knighthood he took of Douglas' sword,
 When English blood swelled Ancram ford ;
 And but that Lord Dacre's steed was wight,
 And bare him ably in the flight,
 Himself had seen him dubbed a knight.
 For the young heir of Branksome's line,
 God be his aid, and God be mine ;
 Through me no friend shall meet his doom ;
 Here, while I live, no foe finds room.
 Then if thy lords their purpose urge,
 Take our defiance loud and high ;
 Our slogan is their lyke-wake dirge,
 Our moat the grave where they shall lie."

XXIV.

Proud she looked round applause to claim—
 Then lightened Thirlestane's eye of flame ;
 His bugle Wat of Harden blew ;
 Pensils and pennons wide were flung,
 To heaven the Border slogan rung,
 " St. Mary for the young Buccleuch !"
 The English war-cry answered wide,
 And forward bent each southern spear ;
 Each Kendale archer made a stride,
 And drew the bowstring to his ear ;
 Each minstrel's war-note loud was blown ;
 But, e'er a gray-goose shaft had flown,
 A horseman galloped from the rear.

XXV.

" Ah, noble Lords !" he breathless said,
 " What treason has your march betrayed ?
 What make you here, from aid so far,
 Before you walls, around you war ?
 Your foemen triumph in the thought,
 That in the toils the lion's caught.
 Already on dark Ruberslaw
 The Douglas holds his weapon-schaw ;
 The lances, waving in his train,
 Clothe the dun heath like autumn grain ;
 And on the Liddle's northern strand,
 To bar retreat to Cumberland,
 Lord Maxwell ranks his merry-men good,
 Beneath the eagle and the rood ;
 And Jedwood, Eske, and Teviotdale,
 Have to proud Angus come ;
 And all the Merse and Lauderdale
 Have risen with haughty Home.
 An exile from Northumberland,
 In Liddisdale I've wandered long ;
 But still my heart was with merry England,
 And cannot brook my country's wrong ;
 And hard I've spurred all night, to shew
 The mustering of the coming foe."

XXVI.

" And let them come !" fierce Dacre cried ;
 " For soon yon crest my father's pride,
 That swept the shores of Judah's sea,
 And waved in gales of Galilee,

From Branksome's highest tower displayed,
 Shall mock the rescue's lingering aid—
 Level each harquebuss on row ;
 Draw, merry archers, draw the bow ;
 Up, bill-men, to the walls, and cry,
 Dacre for England, win or 'die !"

XXVII.

" Yet hear," quoth Howard, " calmly hear,
 Nor deem my words the words of fear ;
 For who in field or foray slack
 Saw the blanche lion e'er fall back ?
 But thus to risque our border flower
 In strife against a kingdom's power,
 Ten thousand Scots 'gainst thousands three,
 Certes, were desperate policy.
 Nay, take the terms the ladye made,
 E'er conscious of the advancing aid :
 Let Musgrave meet fierce Deloraine
 In single fight ; and if he gain,
 He gains for us ; but if he's crossed,
 'Tis but a single warrior lost.
 The rest, retreating as they came,
 Avoid defeat, and death, and shame."

XXVIII.

Ill could the haughty Dacre brook
 His brother-warden's sage rebuke ;
 And yet his forward step he staid,
 And slow and sullenly obeyed :
 But ne'er again the border side
 Did these two lords in friendship ride ;
 And this slight discontent, men say,
 Cost blood upon another day.

XXIX.

The pursuivant-at-arms again
 Before the castle took his stand ;
 His trumpet called, with parleying strain,
 The leaders of the Scottish band ;
 And he defied, in Musgrave's right,
 Stout Deloraine to single fight ;
 A gauntlet at their feet he laid,
 And thus the terms of fight he said—
 " If in the lists good Musgrave's sword
 Vanquish the knight of Deloraine,
 Your youthful chieftain, Branksome's lord,
 Shall hostage for his clan remain :
 If Deloraine foil good Musgrave,
 The boy his liberty shall have.
 Howe'er it falls, the English band,
 Unharming Scots, by Scots unharmed,
 In peaceful march, like men unarmed,
 Shall straight retreat to Cumberland."

XXX.

Unconscious of the near relief,
 The proffer pleased each Scottish chief,
 Though much the ladye sage gainsayed :
 For though their hearts were brave and true,
 From Jedwood's recent sack they knew,
 How tardy was the regent's aid ;
 And you may guess the noble dame
 Durst not the secret prescience own,
 Sprung from the art she might not name,
 By which the coming help was known.
 Closed was the compact, and agreed
 That lists should be inclosed with speed.

Beneath the castle, on a lawn,
 They fixed the morrow for the strife,
 On foot, with Scottish axe and knife,
 At the fourth hour from peep of dawn ;
 When Deloraine, from sickness freed,
 Or else a champion in his stead,
 Should for himself and chieftain stand,
 Against stout Musgrave, hand to hand.

XXXI.

I know right well that, in their lay,
 Full many minstrels sing and say,
 Such combat should be made on horse,
 On foaming steed, in full career,
 With brand to aid, when as the spear
 Should shiver in the course :
 But he, the jovial Harper, taught,
 Me, yet a youth, how it was fought,
 In guise which now I say ;
 He knew each ordinance and clause
 Of black Lord Archibald's battle laws,
 In the old Douglas' day.
 He brooked not, he, that scoffing tongue
 Should tax his minstrelsy with wrong,
 Or call his song untrue :
 For this, when they the goblet plied,
 And such rude taunt had chafed his pride,
 The bard of Reull he slew.
 On Teviot's side, in fight, they stood,
 And tuneful hands were stained with blood ;
 Where still the thorn's white branches wave,
 Memorial o'er his rival's grave.

XXXII.

Why should I tell the rigid doom,
 That dragged my master to his tomb ;
 How Ousenam's maidens tore their hair,
 Wept till their eyes were dead and dim,
 And wrung their hands for love of him,
 Who died at Jedwood Air ?
 He died !—his scholars, one by one,
 To the cold silent grave are gone ;
 And I, alas ! survive alone,
 To muse o'er rivalries of yore,
 And grieve that I shall hear no more
 The strains, with envy heard before ;
 For, with my minstrel brethren fled,
 My jealousy of song is dead.

He paused—the listening dames again
 Applaud the hoary minstrel's strain ;
 With many a word of kindly cheer,
 In pity half, and half sincere,
 marvelled the duchess how so well
 His legendary song could tell—
 Of ancient deeds so long forgot ;
 Of feuds, whose memory was not ;
 Of forests, now laid waste and bare ;
 Of towers, which harbour now the hare ;
 Of manners, long since changed and gone ;
 Of chiefs, who under their gray stone
 So long had slept, that fickle Fame
 Had blotted from her rolls their name,
 And twined round some new minion's head
 The fading wreath for which they bled—

4 N 2

In sooth, 'twas strange, this old man's verse
 Could call them from their marble hearse.
 The Harper smiled, well pleased ; for ne'er
 Was flattery lost on poet's ear :
 A simple race ! they waste their toil
 For the vain tribute of a smile ;
 E'en when in age their flame expires,
 Her dulcet breath can fan its fires ;
 Their drooping fancy wakes at praise,
 And strives to trim the short-lived blaze.
 Smiled then, well pleased, the aged man,
 And thus his tale continued ran.

Canto Fifth.

I.

CALL it not vain—they do not err,
 Who say, that, when the poet dies,
 Mute Nature mourns her worshipper,
 And celebrates his obsequies ;
 Who say, tall cliff, and cavern lone,
 For the departed bard make moan ;
 That mountains weep in crystal rill ;
 That flowers in tears of balm distil ;
 Through his loved groves that breezes sigh,
 And oaks, in deeper groan, reply ;
 And rivers teach their rushing wave
 To murmur dirges round his grave.

II.

Not that, in sooth, o'er mortal urn
 Those things inanimate can mourn ;
 But that the stream, the wood, the gale,
 Is vocal with the plaintive wail
 Of those, who, else forgotten long,
 Lived in the poet's faithful song,
 And, with the poet's parting breath,
 Whose memory feels a second death,
 The maid's pale shade, who wails her lot,
 That love, true love, should be forgot,
 From rose and hawthorn shakes the tear
 Upon the gentle minstrel's bier ;
 The phantom knight, his glory fled,
 Mourns o'er the field he heaped with dead ;
 Mounts the wild blast that sweeps amain,
 And shrieks along the battle-plain ;
 The chief, whose antique crownlet long
 Still sparkled in the feudal song,
 Now, from the mountain's misty throne,
 Sees, in the thanedom once his own,
 His ashes undistinguished lie,
 His place, his power, his memory die :
 His groans the lonely caverns fill,
 His tears of rage impel the rill ;
 All mourn the minstrel's harp unstrung,
 Their name unknown, their praise unsung.

III.

Scarcely the hot assault was staid,
 The terms of truce were scarcely made,
 When they could spy, from Branksome's towers,
 The advancing march of martial powers ;
 Thick clouds of dust afar appeared,
 And trampling steeds were faintly heard ;

Spear-heads, above the columns dun,
Glanced momentary to the sun ;
And feudal banners fair displayed
The bands that moved to Branksome's aid.

IV.

'Vails not to tell each hardy clan,
From the fair Middle Marches came ;
The Bloody Heart blazed in the van,
Announcing Douglas, dreaded name !
'Vails not to tell what hundreds more,
From the rich Merse and Lammermore,
And Tweed's fair borders, to the war,
Beneath the crest of old Dunbar,
And Hepburn's mingled banners, come,
Down the steep mountain glittering far,
And shouting still, " a Home ! a Home ! "

V.

Now squire and knight, from Branksome sent,
On many a courteous message went ;
To every chief and lord they paid
Meet thanks for prompt and powerful aid ;
And told them how a truce was made,
And how a day of fight was ta'en
'Twixt Musgrave and stout Deloraine ;
And how the ladye prayed them dear,
That all would stay the fight to see,
And deign, in love and courtesy,
To taste of Branksome cheer.
Nor, while they bade to feast each Scot,
Were England's noble Lords forgot ;
Himself, the hoary Seneschal,
Rode forth, in seemly terms to call
Those gallant foes to Branksome Hall.
Accepted Howard, than whom knight
Was never dubbed, more bold in fight ;
Nor, when from war and armour free,
More famed for stately courtesy :
But angry Dacre rather chose
In his pavilion to repose.

VI.

Now, noble dame, perchance you ask,
How these two hostile armies met ?
Deeming it were no easy task
To keep the truce which here was set ;
Where martial spirits, all on fire,
Breathed only blood and mortal ire—
—By mutual inroads, mutual blows,
By habit, and by nation foes,
'They met on Teviot's strand :
They met, and sate them mingled down,
Without a threat, without a frown,
As brothers meet in foreign land.
The hands, the spear that lately grasped,
Still in the mailed gauntlet clasped,
Were interchanged in greeting dear ;
Visors were raised, and faces shewn,
And many a friend, to friend made known,
Partook of social cheer.
Some drove the jolly bowl about ;
With dice and draughts some chased the
day ;
And some, with many a merry shout,
In riot, revelry, and rout,
Pursued the foot-ball play.

VII.

Yet, be it known, had bugles blown,
Or sign of war been seen ;
Those bands, so fair together ranged,
Those hands, so frankly interchanged,
Had dyed with gore the green :
The merry shout by Teviot-side
Had sunk in war-cries wild and wide,
And in the groan of death ;
And whingers*, now in friendship bare,
The social meal to part and share,
Had found a bloody sheath.
'Twixt truce and war, such sudden change
Was nor unfrequent, nor held strange,
In the old border-day ;
But yet on Branksome's towers and town,
In peaceful merriment, sunk down
The sun's declining ray.

VIII.

The blithesome signs of wassel gay
Decayed not with the dying day ;
Soon through the latticed windows tall,
Of lofty Branksome's lordly hall,
Divided square by shafts of stone,
Huge flakes of ruddy lustre shone ;
Nor less the gilded rafters rang
With merry harp and beaker's clang ;
And frequent, on the darkening plain,
Loud hollo, whoop, or whistle ran,
As bands, their stragglers to regain,
Give the shrill watch-word of their clan ;
And revellers, o'er their bowls, proclaim
Douglas or Dacre's conquering name.

IX.

Less frequent heard, and fainter still,
At length the various clamours died ;
And you might hear, from Branksome hill,
No sound but Teviot's rushing tide ;
Save, when the changing centinel
The challenge of his watch could tell ;
And save, where, through the dark profound,
The clanging axe and hammer's sound
Rung from the nether lawn ;
For many a busy hand toiled there,
The list's dread barriers to prepare,
Against the morrow's dawn.

X.

Margaret from hall did soon retreat,
Despite the dame's reproving eye ;
Nor marked she, as she left her seat,
Full many a stifled sigh.
For many a noble warrior strove
To win the Flower of Teviot's love,
And many a bold ally.
With throbbing head and anxious heart,
All in her lonely bower apart,
In broken sleep she lay ;
By times, from silken couch she rose,
While yet the bannered hosts repose ;
She viewed the dawning day.
Of all the hundreds sunk to rest,
First woke the loveliest and the best.

* A sort of knife or dagger.

XI.

She gazed upon the inner court,
Which in the tower's tall shadow lay ;
Where coursers' clang, and stamp, and snort,
Had rung the live-long yesterday.
Now still as death—till, stalking slow—
The jingling spurs announced his tread—
A stately warrior passed below ;
But when he raised his plumed head—
Blessed Mary ! can it be ?
Secure, as if in Ousenam bowers,
He walks through Branksome's hostile towers,
With fearless step, and free.
She dare not sign, she dare not speak—
Oh ! if one page's slumbers break,
His blood the price must pay !
Not all the pearls Queen Mary wears,
Not Margaret's yet more precious tears,
Shall buy his life a day.

XII.

Yet was his hazard small—for well
You may bethink you of the spell
Of that sly urchin page ;
This to his Lord he did impart,
And made him seem, by glamour art,
A knight from Hermitage.
Unchallenged, thus, the warder's post,
The court, unchallenged, thus he crossed,
For all the vassalage :
But, O what magic's quaint disguise
Could blind fair Margaret's azure eyes !
She started from her seat ;
While with surprise and fear she strove,
And both could scarcely master love—
Lord Henry's at her feet.

XIII.

Oft have I mused what purpose bad
That foul malicious urchin had
To bring this meeting round ;
For happy love's a heavenly sight,
And by a vile malignant sprite
In such no joy is found :
And oft I've deemed, perchance he thought
Their erring passion might have wrought
Sorrow, and sin, and shame ;
And death to Craunstoun's gallant knight,
And to the gentle ladye bright,
Disgrace, and loss of fame.
But earthy spirit could not tell
The heart of them that loved so well ;
True love's the gift which God has given
To man alone beneath the heaven.
It is not Fantasy's hot fire,
Whose wishes, soon as granted, fly ;
It liveth not in fierce desire,
With dead desire it doth not die ;
It is the secret sympathy,
The silver cord, the silken tie,
Which heart to heart, and mind to mind,
In body and in soul can bind.
Now leave we Margaret and her knight,
To tell you of the approaching fight.

XIV.

Their warning blast the bugles blew,
The pipe's shrill port aroused each clan ;
In haste, the deadly strife to view
The trooping warriors eager ran.
Thick round the lists their lances stood,
Like blasted pines in Ettricke wood ;
To Branksome many a look they threw,
The combatants' approach to view,
And banded many a word of boast
About the knight each favoured most.

XV.

Meantime full anxious was the dame ;
For now arose disputed claim
Of who should fight for Deloraine,
'T'wixt Harden and 'twixt Thirlestaine.
They gan to reckon kin and rent,
And frowning brow on brow was bent ;
But yet not long the strife—for, lo !
Himself, the knight of Deloraine,
Strong, as it seemed, and free from pain,
In armour sheathed from top to toe,
Appeared, and craved the combat due.
The dame her charm successful knew,
And the fierce chiefs their claims withdrew.

XVI.

When for the lists they sought the plain,
The stately ladye's silken rein
Did noble Howard hold ;
Unarmed by her side he walked,
And much, in courteous phrase, they talked
Of feats of arms of old.
Costly his garb—his Flemish ruff
Fell o'er his doublet, shaped of buff,
With sattin slashed, and lined ;
Tawny his boot, and gold his spur,
His cloak was all of Poland fur,
His hose with silver twined ;
His Bilboa blade, by Marchmen felt,
Hung in a broad and studded belt ;
Hence, in rude phrase, the borderers still Called noble Howard, Belted Will.

XVII.

Behind Lord Howard and the dame,
Fair Margaret on her palfrey came,
Whose foot-cloth swept the ground ;
White was her wimple, and her veil,
And her loose locks a chaplet pale
Of whitest roses bound ;
The lordly Angus by her side.
In courtesy to cheer her tried ;
Without his aid, her hand in vain
Had strove to guide her broided rein.
He deemed she shuddered at the sight
Of warriors met for mortal fight ;
But cause of terror, all unguessed,
Was fluttering in her gentle breast,
When in their chairs of crimson placed,
The dame and she the barriers graced.

XVIII.

Prize of the field, the young Buccleuch,
An English knight led forth to view ;
Scarce rued the boy his present plight,
So much he longed to see the fight.

Within the lists, in knightly pride,
High Home and haughty Dacre ride ;
Their leading staffs of steel they wield,
As marshals of the mortal field ;
Then heralds hoarse did loud proclaim,
In king, and queen, and wardens' name,

That none, while lasts the strife,
Should dare, by look, or sign, or word,
Aid to a champion to afford,
On peril of his life.

Then not a breath the silence broke,
Till thus the alternate heralds spoke.

XIX.

ENGLISH HERALD.

Here standeth Richard of Musgrave,
Good knight, and true, and freely born,
Amends from Deloraine to crave,
For foul despiteous scathe and scorn.
He sayeth, that William of Deloraine
Is traitor false by Border laws ;
This with his sword he will maintain,
So help him God, and his good cause !

XX.

SCOTTISH HERALD.

Here standeth William of Deloraine,
Good knight and true, of noble strain,
Who sayeth, that foul treason's stain.
Since he bore arms ne'er soiled his coat,
And that, so help him God above.
He will on Musgrave's body prove,
He lyes most foully in his throat.

LORD DACRE.

Forward, brave champions, to the fight !
Sound trumpets——

LORD HOME.

“ God defend the right ! ”
At the last word, with deadly blows,
The ready warriors fiercely close.

XXI.

Ill would it suit your gentle ear,
Ye lovely listeners, to hear
How to the axe the helms did sound,
And blood poured down from many a wound ;
For desperate was the strife, and long,
And either warrior fierce and strong.
But were each dame a listening knight,
I well could tell how warriors fight ;
For I have seen war's lightning flashing,
Seen the claymore with bayonet clashing,
Seen through red blood the war-horse dashing,
And scorned, amid the reeling strife,
To yield a step for death or life.

XXII.

'Tis done, 'tis done ! that fatal blow
Has stretched him on the bloody plain ;
He strives to rise—Brave Musgrave, no !
Thence never shalt thou rise again !
He chokes in blood—some friendly hand
Undo the visor's barred band,
Unfix the gorget's iron clasp,
And give him room for life to gasp !—

In vain, in vain—haste, holy friar,
Haste, ere the sinner shall expire !
Of all his guilt let him be shriven,
And smooth his path from earth to heaven.

XXIII.

In haste the holy friar sped,
His naked foot was dyed with red,
As through the lists he ran ;
Unmindful of the shouts on high,
That hailed the conqueror's victory,
He raised the dying man ;
Loose waved his silver beard and hair,
As o'er him he kneeled down in prayer,
And still the crucifix on high,
He holds before his darkening eye.
And still he bends an anxious ear,
His faltering penitence to hear ;
Still props him from the bloody sod,
Still even when soul and body part,
Pours ghostly comfort on his heart,
And bids him trust in God !
Unheard he prays ; 'tis o'er, 'tis o'er !
Richard of Musgrave breathes no more.

XXIV.

As if exhausted in the fight,
Or musing o'er the piteous sight,
The silent victor stands ;
His heaver did he not unclasp,
Marked not the shouts, felt not the grasp
Of gratulating hands.
When lo ! strange cries of wild surprise,
Mingled with seeming terror, rise
Among the Scottish bands ;
And all amid the thronged array,
In panic haste gave open way,
To a half-naked ghastly man,
Who downward from the castle ran ;
He crossed the barriers at a bound,
And wild and haggard looked around,
As dizzy, and in pain ;
And all, upon the armed ground,
Knew William of Deloraine !
Each ladye sprung from seat with speed ;
Vaulted each marshal from his steed ;
“ And who art thou,” they cried,
“ Who hast this battle fought and won ? ”
His plumed helm was soon undone—“ Cranstoun of Teviotside !
For this fair prize I've fought and won,”—
And to the ladye led her son.

XXV.

Full oft the rescued boy she kissed,
And often pressed him to her breast ;
For, under all her dauntless show,
Her heart had throbbed at every blow ;
Yet not Lord Cranstoun deigned she greet,
Though low he kneeled at her feet.
Me lists not tell what words were made,
What Douglas, Home, and Howard said—
—For Howard was a generous foe—
And how the clan united prayed,
The ladye would the feud forego,
And deign to bless the nuptial hour
Of Cranstoun's Lord and Teviot's Flower.

XXVI.

She looked to river, looked to hill,
 Thought on the spirit's prophecy,
 Then broke her silence stern and still,
 "Not you, but Fate, has vanquished me ;
 Their influence kindly stars may shower
 On Teviot's tide and Branksome's tower,
 For pride is quelled, and love is free."
 She took fair Margaret by the hand,
 Who, breathless, trembling, scarce might stand ;
 That hand to Cranstoun's lord gave she.
 "As I am true to thee and thine,
 Do thou be true to me and mine !
 This clasp of love our bond shall be ;
 For this is your betrothing day,
 And all these noble lords shall stay,
 To grace it with their company."

XXVII.

All as they left the listed plain,
 Much of the story she did gain,
 How Cranstoun fought with Deloraine,
 And of his page, and of the book,
 Which from the wounded knight he took ;
 And how he sought her castle high ;
 That morn, by help of gramarye ;
 How, in Sir William's armour dight,
 Stolen by his page, while slept the knight,
 He took on him the single fight.
 But half his tale he left unsaid,
 And lingered till he joined the maid.
 Cared not the ladye to betray
 Her mystic arts in view of day ;
 But well she thought ere midnight cam',
 Of that strange page the pride to tame,
 From his foul hands the book to save,
 And send it back to Michael's grave.
 Needs not to tell each tender word
 'Twixt Margaret and 'twixt Cranstoun's lord ;
 Now how she told of former woes,
 And how her bosom fell and rose,
 Whilst he and Musgrave banded blows—
 Needs not these lovers' joys to tell ;
 One day, fair maids, you'll know them well.

XXVIII.

William of Deloraine, some chance
 Had wakened from his deathlike trance ;
 And taught that, in the listed plain,
 Another, in his arms and shield,
 Against fierce Musgrave axe did wield,
 Under the name of Deloraine.
 Hence, to the field, unarmed, he ran,
 And hence his presence scared the clan,
 Who held him for some fleeting wraith,
 And not a man of blood and breath.
 Not much this new ally he loved,
 Yet, when he saw what hap had proved,
 He greeted him right heartlie.
 He would not waken old debate,
 For he was void of rancorous hate,
 Though rude, and scant of courtesy ;
 In raids he spilt but seldom blood,
 Unless when men at arms withstood,
 Or, as was meet, for deadly feud.
 He ne'er bore grudge for stalwart blow,

Ta'en in fair fight from gallant foe :
 And so 'twas seen of him ; e'en now,
 When on dead Musgrave he looked down,
 Grief darkened on his rugged brow,
 Though half-disguised with a frown ;
 And thus, while sorrow bent his head,
 His foeman's epitaph he made.

XXIX.

"Now, Richard Musgrave, liest thou here !
 I ween my deadly enemy,
 For if I slew thy brother dear,
 Thou slewest a sister's son to me ;
 And when I lay in dungeon dark,
 Of Naworth castle, long months three,
 Till, ransomed for a thousand mark,
 Dark Musgrave, it was long of thee.
 And, Musgrave, could our fight be tried,
 And thou wert now alive, as I,
 No mortal man should us divide,
 Till one, or both of us, did die :
 Yet, rest thee God ! for well I know,
 I ne'er shall find a nobler foe !
 In all the northern counties here,
 Whose word is, Snaffe, spur, and spear,
 Thou wert the best to follow gear ;
 'Twas pleasure, as we looked behind,
 To see how thou the chace couldst wind,
 Cheer the dark blood-hound on his way,
 And with the hagle rouse the fray !
 I'd give the lands of Deloraine,
 Dark Musgrave were alive again."

XXX

So mourned he, till Lord Dacre's band
 Were bowning back to Cumberland.
 They raised brave Musgrave from the field,
 And laid him on his bloody shield ;
 On levelled lances, four and four,
 By turns, the noble burden bore.
 Before, at times, upon the gale,
 Was heard the minstrel's plaintive wail ;
 Behind, four priests, in sable stole,
 Sung requiem for the warrior's soul ;
 Around, the horsemen slowly rode ;
 With trailing pikes the spearmen trod ;
 And thus the gallant knight they bore,
 Through Liddesdale to Leven's shore,
 Thence to Holme Coltrame's lofty nave,
 And laid him in his father's grave.

 The harp's wild notes, though hushed the song
 The mimic march of death prolong ;
 Now seems it far, and now a-near,
 Now meets, and now eludes the ear ;
 Now seems some mountain's side to sweep,
 Now faintly dies in valley deep ;
 Seems now as if the minstrel's wail,
 Now the sad requiem loads the gale ;
 Last, o'er the warrior's closing grave,
 Rang the full choir in choral stave.
 After due pause, they bade him tell,
 Why he, who touched the harp so well,
 Should thus, with ill-rewarded toil,
 Wander a poor and thankless soil,

When the more generous southern land
Would well requite his skilful hand.

The aged Harper, howsoe'er
His only friend, his harp, was dear,
Liked not to hear it ranked so high
Above his flowing poesy ;
Less liked he still, that scornful jeer
Misprized the land he loved so dear ;
High was the sound, as thus again
The Bard resumed his minstrel strain.

Canton Sixth.

I.

BREATHES there the man, with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,

This is my own, my native land !
Whose heart hath ne'er within him burned,
As home his footsteps he hath turned,

From wandering on a foreign strand !
If such there breathe, go, mark him well ;
For him no minstrel raptures swell ;
High though his titles, proud his name,
Boundless his wealth as wish can claim ;
Despite those titles, power, and pelf,
The wretch, concentrated all in self,
Living, shall forfeit fair renown,
And, doubly dying, shall go down
To the vile dust, from whence he sprung,
Unwept, unhonoured, and unsung.

II.

O Caledonia ! stern and wild,
Meet nurse for a poetic child !
Land of brown heath and shaggy wood,
Land of the mountain and the flood,
Land of my sires ! what mortal hand
Can e'er untie the filial band,
That knits me to thy rugged strand !
Still, as I view each well known scene,
Think what is now, and what hath been,
Seems as, to me, of all hereft,
Sole friends, thy woods and streams were left ;
And thus I love them better still,
Even in extremity of ill.

By Yarrow's stream still let me stray,
Though none should guide my feeble way ;
Still feel the breeze down Ettrick break,
Although it chill my withered cheek ;
Though there, forgotten and alone,
The Bard may draw his parting groan.

III.

Not scorned like me ! to Branksome Hall
The minstrels came, at festive call ;
Trooping they came, from near and far,
The jovial priests of mirth and war ;
Alike for feast and fight prepared,
Battle and banquet both they shared.
Of late, before each martial clan,
They blew their death-note in the van ;
But now, for every merry mate,
Rose the Portcullis' iron grate ;
They sound the pipe, they strike the string,
They dance, they revel, and they sing,
Till the rude turrets shake and ring.

IV.

Me lists not at this tide declare

The splendour of the spousal rite,
How mustered in the chapel fair,
Both maid and matron, squire and knight ;
Me lists not tell of owches rare,
Of mantles green, and braided hair,
And kirtles furred with miniver ;
What plumage waved the altar round,
How spurs, and ringing chainlets, sound :
And hard it were for bard to speak
The changeful hue of Margaret's cheek ;
That lovely hue, which comes and flies,
As awe and shame alternate rise !

V.

Some bards have sung, the ladye high
Chapel or altar came not nigh ;
Nor durst the rites of spousal grace,
So much she feared each holy place.
False slanders these—I trust right well,
She wrought not by forbidden spell ;
For, mighty words and signs have power
O'er sprites in planetary hour—
Yet scarce I praise their venturous part,
Who tamper with such dangerous art.
But this for faithful truth I say,

The ladye by the altar stood,
Of sable velvet her array,
And on her head a crimson hood,
With pearls embroidered and entwined,
Guarded with gold, with ermine lined ;
A merlin sat upon her wrist,
Held by a leash of silken twist.

VI.

The spousal rites were ended soon ;
'Twas now the merry hour of noon,
And in the lofty-arched hall
Was spread the gorgeous festival ;
Steward and squire, with heedful haste,
Marshalled the rank of every guest ;
Pages, with ready blade, were there,
The mighty meal to carve and share.
O'er capon, heron-shew, and crane,
And princely peacock's gilded train,
And o'er the boar-head, garnished brave,
And cygnet from St. Mary's wave ;
O'er ptarmigan and venison,
The priest had spoke his benison.
Then rose the riot and the din,
Above, beneath, without, within !
For, from the lofty balcony,
Rung trumpet, shalm, and psaltery ;
Their clanging bowls old warriors quaffed,
Loudly they spoke, and loudly laughed ;
Whispered young knights, in tone more mild,
To ladies fair, and ladies smiled.
The hooded hawks, high perched on beam,
The clamour joined with whistling scream,
And flapped their wings, and shook their bells,
In concert with the staghounds' yells.
Round go the flasks of ruddy wine,
From Bourdeaux, Orleans, or the Rhine ;
Their tasks the busy sewers ply,
And all is mirth and revelry.

VII.

The goblin page, omitting still
 No opportunity of ill,
 Strove now, while blood ran hot and high,
 To rouse debate and jealousy;
 Till Conrade, lord of Wolfenstein,
 By nature fierce, and warm with wine,
 And now in humour highly crossed,
 About some steeds his band had lost,
 High words to words succeeding still,
 Smote, with his gauntlet, stout Hunthill;
 A hot and hardy Rutherford,
 Whom men called Dickon Draw-the-sword.
 He took it, on the page's saye,
 Hunthill had driven these steeds away.
 Then Howard, Home, and Douglas rose,
 The kindling discord to compose.
 Stern Rutherford right little said,
 But bit his glove and shook his head—
 A fortnight thence, in Inglewood,
 Stout Conrade, cold, and drenched in blood,
 His bosom gored with many a wound,
 Was by a woodman's lyme-dog found;
 Unknown the manner of his death,
 Gone was his brand, both sword and sheath;
 But ever from that time, 'twas said,
 That Dickon wore a Cologne blade.

VIII.

The dwarf, who feared his master's eye
 Might his foul treachery espie,
 Now sought the castle buttery,
 Where many a yeoman, bold and free,
 Revelled as merrily and well,
 As those that sate in lordly selle.
 Wat Tinlinn, there, did frankly raise
 The pledge to Arthur Fire-the-braes;
 And he, as by his breeding bound,
 To Howard's merry-men sent it round.
 To quit them on the English side,
 Red Roland Forster loudly cried,
 "A deep carouse to yon fair bride!"
 At every pledge, from vat and pail,
 Foamed forth, in floods, the nut-brown ale;
 While shout the riders every one,
 Such day of mirth ne'er cheered their clan,
 Since old Buckleuch the name did gain,
 When in the cleuch the buck was ta'en.

IX.

The wily page, with vengeful thought,
 Remembered him of Tinlinn's yew,
 And swore, it should be dearly bought,
 That ever he that arrow drew,
 First, he the yeoman did molest,
 With bitter gibe and taunting jest;
 Told how he fled at Solway strife,
 And how Hob Armstrong cheered his wife;
 Then, shunning still his powerful arm,
 At unawares he wrought him harm;
 From trencher stole his choicest cheer,
 Dashed from his lips his can of beer,
 Then, too his knee sly creeping on,
 With bodkin pierced him to the bone:

The venom'd wound, and festering joint,
 Long after rued that bodkin's point.
 The startled yeoman swore and spurned,
 And board and flaggons overturned;
 Riot and clamour wild began;
 Back to the hall the urchin ran;
 Took, in a darkling nook, his post,
 And grinned and muttered, "Lost! lost! lost!"

By this, the dame, lest further fray
 Should mar the concord of the day,
 Had bid the minstrels tune their lay.
 And first stept forth old Albert Grame,
 The minstrel of that ancient name:
 Was none who struck the harp so well,
 Within the Land Debateable;
 Well friended too, his hardy kin,
 Whoever lost, were sure to win;
 They sought the beeves that made their broth,
 In Scotland and in England both.
 In homely guise, as nature bade,
 His simple song the borderer said.

XI.

ALBERT GRAME.

It was an English ladye bright,
 The sun shines fair on Carlisle wall,
 And she would marry a Scottish knight,
 For love will still be lord of all!

Blithely they saw the rising sun,
 When he shone fair on Carlisle wall,
 But they were sad ere day was done,
 Though love was still the lord of all!

Her sire gave brooch and jewel fine,
 Where the sun shines fair on Carlisle wall,
 Her brother gave but a flask of wine,
 For ire that love was lord of all!

For she had lands, both meadow and lea,
 Where the sun shines fair on Carlisle wall,
 And he swore her death ere he would see
 A Scottish knight the lord of all!

XII.

That wine she had not tasted well,
 The sun shines fair on Carlisle wall;
 When dead, in her true lover's arms, she fell,
 For love was still the lord of all!

He pierced her brother to the heart,
 Where the sun shines fair on Carlisle wall;
 So perish all would true love part,
 That love may still be lord of all!

And then he took the cross divine,
 Where the sun shines fair on Carlisle wall,
 And died for her sake in Palestine,
 So love was still the lord of all!

Now all ye lovers that faithful prove,
 The sun shines fair on Carlisle wall,
 Pray for their souls who died for love,
 For love shall still be lord of all!

XIII.

As ended Albert's simple lay,
 Arose a bard of loftier port ;
 For sonnet, rhyme, and roundelay,
 Renowned in haughty Henry's court :
 There rung thy harp, unrivalled long,
 Fitztraver of the silver song.
 The gentle Surrey loved his lyre—
 Who has not heard of Surrey's fame ?
 His was the hero's soul of fire,
 And his the bard's immortal name,
 And his was love exalted high,
 By all the glow of chivalry.

XIV.

They sought, together, climes afar,
 And oft within some olive grove,
 When evening came, with twinkling star,
 They sung of Surrey's absent love.
 His step the Italian peasant staid,
 And deemed, that spirits from on high,
 Round where some hermit saint was laid,
 Were breathing heavenly melody ;
 So sweet their harps and voices join,
 To praise the name of Geraldine.

XV.

Fitztraver ! O what tongue may say,
 The pangs thy faithful bosom knew,
 When Surrey, of the deathless lay,
 Ungrateful Tudor's sentence slew ?
 Regardless of the tyrant's frown,
 His harp called wrath and vengeance down ;
 He left, for Naworth's iron towers,
 Windsor's green glades, and courtly bowers ;
 And faithful to his patron's name,
 With Howard, still, Fitztraver came ;
 Lord William's foremost favourite he,
 And chief of all his minstrelsy.

XVI.

FITZTRAVER.

'Twas All-soul's eve, and Surrey's heart beat high ! [start,
 He heard the midnight-bell with anxious
 Which told the mystic hour, approaching nigh,
 When wise Cornelius promised, by his art,
 To shew to him the ladye of his heart,
 Albeit, betwixt them roared the ocean grim,
 Yet so the sage had hight to play his part,
 That he should see her form in life and limb,
 And mark, if still she loved, and still she thought of him.

XVII.

Dark was the vaulted room of gramarye,
 To which the wizard led the gallant knight,
 Save that before a mirror, huge and high,
 A hallowed taper shed a glimmering light
 On mystic implements of magic might,
 On cross, and character, and talisman,
 And almagest, and altar, nothing bright :
 For fitful was the lustre, pale and wan,
 As watch-light, by the bed of some departing man.

XVIII.

But soon within that mirror, huge and high,
 Was seen a self-emitted light to gleam ;

And forms upon its breast, the earl 'gan spy,
 Cloudy and indistinct, as feverish dream ;
 Till, slow arranging, and defined, they seem
 To form a lordly and a lofty room,
 Part lighted by a lamp, with silver beam,
 Placed by a couch of Agra's silken loom,
 And part by moonshine pale, and part was hid in gloom.

XIX.

Fair all the pageant—but how passing fair
 The slender form which lay on couch of Ind !
 O'er her white bosom strayed her hazel hair,
 Pale her dear cheek, as if for love she pin-
 ed ;
 All in her night-robe loose, she lay reclin-
 ed,
 And, pensive, read from tablet eburnine,
 Some strain, that seemed her inmost soul to find—
 That favoured strain was Surrey's raptured line,

That fair and lovely form, the ladye Geraldine.

XX.

Slow rolled the clouds upon the lovely form,
 And swept the goodly vision all away—
 So royal envy rolled the murky storm
 O'er my beloved master's glorious day.
 Thou jealous, ruthless tyrant ! Heaven repay
 On thee, and on thy children's latest line,
 The wild caprice of thy despotic sway,
 The gory bridal bed, the plundered shrine,
 The murdered Surrey's blood, the tears of Geraldine !

XXI.

Both Scots, and Southern chiefs, prolong
 Applauses of Fitztraver's song ;
 These hated Henry's name as death,
 And those still held the ancient faith.
 Then, from his seat, with lofty air,
 Rose Harold, bard of brave St. Clair :
 St. Clair, who, feasting high at Home,
 Had with that lord to battle come.
 Harold was born where restless seas
 Howl round the storm-swept Orcades ;
 Where erst St. Clairs held princely sway,
 O'er isle and islet, strait and bay ;
 Still nods their palace to its fall,
 Thy pride and sorrow, fair Kirkwall !
 Thence oft he marked fierce Pentland rave,
 As if grim Odinn rode her wave ;
 And watched, the whilst, with visage pale,
 And throbbing heart, the struggling sail ;
 For all of wonderful and wild
 Had rapture for the lonely child.

XXII.

And much of wild and wonderful ;
 In these rude isles, might Fancy cull ;
 For thither came, in times afar,
 Stern Lochlin's sons of roving war,
 The Norsemen, trained to spoil and blood,
 Skilled to prepare the raven's food ;
 Kings of the main, their leaders brave,
 Their barks, the dragons of the wave ;

And there, in many a stormy vale,
 The Scald had told his wondrous tale;
 And many a Runic column high
 Had witnessed grim idolatry.
 And thus had Harold, in his youth,
 Learned many a Saga's rhyme uncouth,
 Of that sea-snake, tremendous curled,
 Whose monstrous circle girds the world;
 Of those dread maids, whose hideous yell
 Maddens the battle's bloody swell;
 Of chiefs, who, guided through the gloom
 By the pale death-lights of the tomb,
 Ransacked the graves of warriors old,
 Their faulchions wrenched from corpses' hold,
 Waked the deaf tomb with war's alarms,
 And bade the dead arise to arms!
 With war and wonder all on flame,
 To Roslin's bowers young Harold came,
 Where, by sweet glen and greenwood tree,
 He learned a milder minstrelsy;
 Yet something of the northern spell
 Mixed with the softer numbers well.

XXIII.

HAROLD.

O listen, listen, ladies gay!
 No haughty feat of arms I tell;
 Soft is the note, and sad the lay,
 That mourns the lovely Rosabelle.

—“Moor, moor the barge, ye gallant crew!
 And, gentle ladye, deign to stay!
 Rest thee in Castle Ravensheuch,
 Nor tempt the stormy firth to-day.

“The blackening wave is edged with white:
 To inch and rock the sea-mews fly;
 The fi-ehs have heard the water-sprite,
 Whose screams forbode that wreck is nigh.

“Last night the gifted seer did view
 A wet shroud rolled round ladye gay;
 Then stay thee, Fair, in Ravensheuch:
 Why cross the gloomy firth to-day?”—

—“’Tis not because Lord Lindesay's heir
 To-night at Roslin leads the ball,
 But that my ladye-mother there
 Sits lonely in her castle-hall.

“’Tis not because the ring they ride,
 And Lindesay at the ring rides well,
 But that my sire the wine will chide,
 If ’tis not filled by Rosabelle.”—

O'er Roslin all that dreary night
 A wondrous blaze was seen to gleam;
 ’Twas broader than the watch-fire light,
 And brighter than the bright moon-beam.

It glared on Roslin's castled rock,
 It reddened all the copse-wood glen;
 ’Twas seen from Dryden's groves of oak,
 And seen from caverned Hawthornden.

Seemed all on fire that chapel proud,
 Where Roslin's chiefs uncoffined lie;
 Each Baron, for a sable shroud,
 Sheathed in his iron panoply.

Seemed all on fire within, around,
 Both vaulted crypt and altar's pale;
 Shone every pillar foliage-bound,
 And glimmered all the dead-men's mail.

Blazed battlement and pinnet high,
 Blazed every rose-carved buttress fair—
 So still they blaze when fate is nigh
 The lordly line of high St. Clair.

There are twenty of Roslin's barons bold
 Lie buried within that proud chapelle;
 Each one the holy vault doth hold—
 But the sea holds lovely Rosabelle!

And each St. Clair was buried there,
 With candle, with book, and with knell;
 But the kelpy rung, and the mermaid sung,
 The dirge of lovely Rosabelle.

XXV.

So sweet was Harold's piteous lay,
 Scarce marked the guests the darkened
 hall,

Though long before the sinking day,
 A wonderous shade involved them all:
 It was not eddying mist or fog,
 Drained by the sun from fen or bog;
 Of no eclipse had sages told;
 And yet, as it came on apace,
 Each one could scarce his neighbour's face,
 Could scarce his own stretched hand, behold.
 A secret horror checked the feast,
 And chilled the soul of every guest;
 Even the high dame stood half aghast,
 She knew some evil on the blast;
 The elvish page fell to the ground,
 And, shuddering, muttered, “Found! found!
 found!”

XXVI.

Then sudden through the darkened air
 A flash of lightning came;
 So broad, so bright, so red the glare,
 The castle seemed on flame;
 Glanced every rafter of the hall,
 Glanced every shield upon the wall,
 Each trophied beam, each sculptured stone,
 Were instant seen, and instant gone;
 Full through the guests' bedazzled band
 Resistless flashed the levin-brand,
 And filled the hall with smouldering smoke,
 As on the elvish page it broke—
 It broke with thunder long and loud,
 Dismayed the brave, appalled the proud,
 From sea to sea the larum rung;
 On Berwick wall, and at Carlisle withal,
 To arms the startled warders sprung.
 When ended was the dreadful roar,
 The elvish dwarf was seen no more!

XXVII.

Some heard a voice in Branksome Hall,
Some saw a sight not seen by all;
That dreadful voice was heard by some,
Cry with loud summons, "GYLBYN, COME!"
And on the spot where burst the brand,

Just where the page had flung him down,
Some saw an arm, and some a hand,

And some the waving of a gown.
The guests in silence prayed and shook,
And terror dimm'd each lofty look:
But none of all the astonished train
Was so dismayed as Deloraine;
His blood did freeze, his brain did burn,
'Twas feared his mind would ne'er return;
For he was speechless, ghastly, wan,
Like him of whom the story ran,
Who spoke the spectre-hound in man.
At length, by fits, he darkly told,
With broken hint, and shuddering cold—

That he had seen right certainly,
A shape with amice wrapped around,
With a wrought Spanish baldric bound,
Like a pilgrim from beyond the sea—
And knew—but how it mattered not—
It was the wizard, Michael Scott.

XXVIII.

The anxious crowd, with horror pale,
All trembling, heard the wonderful tale;
No sound was made, no word was spoke,
Till noble Angus silence broke;

And he a solemn sacred plight
Did to St. Bryde of Douglas make,
That he a pilgrimage would take
To Melrose Abbey, for the sake
Of Michael's restless sprite.
Then each to ease his troubled breast,
To some blessed saint his prayers addressed:
Some to St. Modan made their vows,
Some to St. Mary of the Loves,
Some to the Holy Rood of Lisle,
Some to our Lady of the Isle;
Each did his patron witness make,
That he such pilgrimage would take,
And monks should sing, and bells should toll,
All for the weal of Michael's soul.
While vows were ta'en, and prayers were pray-
ed,

'Tis said the noble dame, dismayed,
Renounced for aye dark magic's aid.

XXIX.

Nought of the bridal will I tell,
Which after in short space befel;
Nor how brave sons and daughters fair
Blessed Teviot's Flower, and Cranstoun's heir:
After such dreadful scene, 'twere vain
To wake the note of mirth again;
More meet it were to mark the day

Of penitence and prayer divine,
When pilgrim-chiefs, in sad array,
Sought Melrose' holy shrine.

XXX.

With naked foot, and sackcloth vest,
And arms enfolded on his breast,

Did every pilgrim go;
The standers-bye might hear uneath,
Footstep, or voice, or high-drawn breath,
Through all the lengthened row;
No lordly look, no martial stride,
Gone was their glory, sunk their pride,
Forgotten their renown;
Silent and slow, like ghosts, they glide
To the high altar's hallowed side.
And there they kneeled them down:
Above the suppliant chieftains wave
The banners of departed brave;
Beneath the lettered stones were laid
The ashes of their fathers dead;
From many a garnished nich around,
Stern saints, and tortured martyrs, frowned.

XXXI.

And slow up the dim aisle afar,
With sable cowl and scapular,
And snow-white stoles, in order due,
The holy fathers two and two,
In long procession came;
Taper, and host, and book, they bare,
And holy banner, flourished fair,
With the Redeemer's name;
Above the prostrate pilgrim band,
The mitred abbot stretched his hand,
And blessed them as they kneeled;
With holy cross he signed them all,
And prayed they might be sage in hall,
And fortunate in field.
Then mass was sung, and prayers were said,
And solemn requiem for the dead;
And bells tolled out their mighty peal,
For the departed spirit's weal;
And ever in the office close
The hymn of intercession rose;
And far the echoing aisles prolong
The awful burthen of the song,
DIES IRÆ, DIES ILLA,
SOLVET SÆCULUM IN FAVILLA;
While the pealing organ rung;
Were it meet with sacred strain
To close my lay so light and vain,
Thus the holy fathers sung.

XXXII.

HYMN FOR THE DEAD.

That day of wrath, that dreadful day,
When heaven and earth shall pass away,
What power shall be the sinner's stay?
How shall he meet that dreadful day?

When, shrivelling like a parched scroll,
The flaming heavens together roll,
When louder yet, and yet more dread,
Swells the high trump that wakes the dead;

O! on that day, that wrathful day,
When man to judgment wakes from clay,
Be 'thou the trembling sinner's stay,
Though heaven and earth shall pass away!

Hushed is the harp—the minstrel gone.
And did he wander forth alone?

Alone in indigence, and age,
 To linger out his pilgrimage ?
 No—close beneath proud Newark's tower ;
 Arose the minstrel's lowly bower ;
 A simple hut ; but there was seen
 The little garden hedged with green,
 The cheerful hearth, and lattice clean.
 There sheltered wanderers, by the blaze,
 Oft heard the tale of other days ;
 For much he loved to ope his door,
 And give the aid he begged before.
 So passed the winter's day—but still,
 When summer smiled on sweet Bowhill,
 And July's eve, with balmy breath,
 Waved the blue-bells on Newark heath ;
 When throistles sung on Harehead-shaw,
 And grain waved green on Carterhaugh,
 And flourished, broad, Blackandro's oak,
 The aged harper's soul awoke !
 Then would he sing achievements high,
 And circumstance of chivalry,
 Till the rapt traveller would stay,
 Forgetful of the closing day ;
 And noble youths, the strain to hear,
 Forsook the hunting of the deer ;
 And Yarrow, as he rolled along,
 Bore burden to the minstrel's song.

THE VILLAGE.

[Book I.]

THE village life, and every care that reigns
 O'er youthful peasants and declining swains,
 What labour yields, and what, that labour past,
 Age, in its hour of languor, finds at last ;
 What form the real picture of the poor,
 Demand a song—the Muse can give no more.

Fled are those times, when, in harmonious strains,

The rustic poet prais'd his native plains :
 No shepherds now, in smooth alternate verse,
 Their country's beauty or their nymphs' rehearse ;

Yet still for these we frame the tender strain,
 Still in our lays fond Corydons complain,
 And shepherds' boys their amorous pains reveal,
 The only pains, alas ! they never feel.

On Mincio's banks, in Cæsar's bounteous reign,
 If Tityrus found the golden age again,
 Must sleepy bards the flattering dream prolong,
 Mechanic echoes of the Mantuan song ?
 From truth and nature shall we widely stray,
 Where Virgil, not where fancy, leads the way ?

Yes, thus the Muses sing of happy swains,
 Because the Muses never knew their pains :
 They boast their peasants' pipes ; but peasants
 now

Resign their pipes, and plod behind the plough ;
 And few, amid the rural-tribe, have time
 To number syllables and play with rhyme ;
 Save honest Duck, what son of verse could share
 The poet's rapture and the peasant's care ?
 Or the great labours of the field degrade
 With the new peril of a poorer trade ?

From this chief cause these idle praises spring,
 That themes so easy few forbear to sing ;
 For no deep thought the trifling subjects ask,
 To sing of shepherds is an easy task :
 The happy youth assumes the common strain,
 A nymph his mistress and himself a swain ;
 With no sad scenes he clouds his tuneful prayer,
 But all, to look like her, is painted fair.

I grant indeed that fields and flocks have charms
 For him that grazes or for him that farms ;
 But when amid such pleasing scenes I trace
 The poor laborious natives of the place,
 And see the mid-day sun, with fervid ray,
 On their bare heads and dewy temples play ;
 While some, with feebler heads and fainter hearts,

Deplore their fortune, yet sustain their parts :
 Then shall I dare these real ills to hide
 In tinsel trappings of poetic pride ?

No ; cast by fortune on a frowning coast,
 Which neither groves nor happy valleys boast ;
 Where other cares than those the Muse relates,
 And other shepherds dwell with other mates ;
 By such examples taught, I paint the cot,
 As truth will paint it and as bards will not :
 Nor you, ye poor, of letter'd scorn complain ;
 To you the smoothest song is smooth in vain ;
 O'ercome by labour and bow'd down by time,
 Feel you the barren flattery of a rhyme ?
 Can poets soothe you, when you pine for bread,
 By winding myrtles round your ruin'd shade ?
 Can their light tales your weighty griefs o'er-
 power,
 Or glad with airy mirth the toilsome hour ?

Lo ! where the heath, with withering brake grown o'er,

Lends the light turf that warms the neighbouring poor ;

From thence a length of burning sand appears,
 Where the thin harvest waves its wither'd ears ;
 Rank weeds, that every art and care defy,
 Reign o'er the land and rob the blighted rye :
 There thistles stretch their prickly arms afar,
 And to the ragged infant threaten war ;
 There poppies nodding, mock the hope of toil ;
 There the blue bugloss paints the sterile soil ;
 Hardy and high, above the slender sheaf,
 The slimy mallow waves her silky leaf ;

O'er the young shoot the charlock throws a
 shade,
 And clasping tares cling round the sickly blade ;
 With mingled tints the rocky coasts abound,
 And a sad splendour vainly shines around.
 So looks the nymph whom wretched arts adorn,
 Betray'd by man, then left for man to scorn ;
 Whose cheek in vain assumes the mimic rose,
 While her sad eyes the troubled breast disclose ;
 Whose outward splendour is but folly's dress,
 Exposing most, when most it gilds distress.

Here joyless roam a wild amphibious race,
 With sullen woe display'd in every face ;
 Who, far from civil arts and social fly,
 And scowl at strangers with suspicious eye.

Here too the lawless merchant of the main
 Draws from his plough th' intoxicated swain ;
 Want only claim'd the labour of the day,
 But vice now steals his nightly rest away.

Where are the swains, who, daily labour done,
 With rural games play'd down the setting sun ;
 Who struck with matchless force the bounding ball,

Or made the pond'rous quoit obliquely fall ;
 While some huge Ajax, terrible and strong,
 Engag'd some artful stripling of the throng,
 And fell beneath him, foil'd, while far around Hoarse triumph rose, and rocks return'd the sound ?

Where now are these ?—beneath yon cliff they stand,

To show the freighted pinnacle where to land ;
 To load the ready steed with guilty haste,
 To fly in terror o'er the pathless waste,
 Or, when detected, in their straggling course,
 To foil their foes by cunning or by force ;
 Or, yielding part (which equal knaves demand),
 To gain a lawless passport through the land.

Here, wand'ring long, amid these frowning fields,

I sought the simple life that nature yields ;
 Rapine and wrong and fear usurp'd her place,
 And a bold, artful, surly, savage race ;
 Who, only skill'd to take the finny tribe,
 The yearly dinner, or septennial bribe,
 Wait on the shore, and, as the waves run high,
 On the tost vessel bend their eager eye ;
 Which to their coast directs its vent'rous way,
 Theirs, or the ocean's miserable prey.

As on their neighbouring beach yon swallows
 stand,

And wait for favouring winds to leave the land ;
 While still for flight the ready wing is spread :
 So waited I the favouring hour, and fled—
 Fled from these shores where guilt and famine
 reign—

And cry'd, Ah ! hapless they who still remain ;
 Who still remain to hear the ocean roar,
 Whose greedy waves devour the lessening shore ;

Till some fierce tide, with more imperious sway,
 Sweeps the low hut and all it holds away ;
 When the sad tenant weeps from door to door,
 And begs a poor protection from the poor !

But these are scenes where nature's niggard
 hand

Gave a spare portion to the famish'd land ;
 Hers is the fault, if here mankind complain
 Of fruitless toil and labour spent in vain ;
 But yet in other scenes more fair in view,
 Where plenty smiles—alas ! she smiles for few—

And those who taste not, yet behold her store,
 Are as the slaves that dig the golden ore,
 The wealth around them makes them doubly poor.

Or will you deem them amply paid in health,
 Labour's fair child, that languishes with wealth ?
 Go then ! and see them rising with the sun,
 Through a long course of daily toil to run ;
 See them beneath the dog-star's raging heat.

When the knees tremble and the temples beat ;
 Behold them, leaning on their scythes, look o'er
 The labour past, and toils to come explore ;
 See them alternate suns and showers engage,
 And hoard up aches and anguish for their age ;
 Through fens and marshy moors their steps pursue,

When their warm pores imbibe the evening
 dew ;

Then own that labour may as fatal be
 To these thy slaves, as thine excess to thee.

Amid this tribe too oft a manly pride
 Strives in strong toil the fainting heart to hide ;
 There may you see the youth of slender frame
 Contend with weakness, weariness, and shame ;
 Yet, urg'd along, and proudly loth to yield,
 He strives to join his fellows of the field :
 Till long-contending nature droops at last,
 Declining health rejects his poor repast,
 His cheerless spouse the coming danger sees,
 And mutual murmurs urge the slow disease.

Yet grant them health, 'tis not for us to tell,
 Though the head droops not, that the heart is
 well ;

Or will you praise that homely healthy fare,
 Plenteous and plain, that happy peasants share ?
 Oh ! trifle not with wants you cannot feel,
 Nor mock the misery of a stinted meal ;
 Homely not wholesome, plain not plenteous,
 such

As you who praise would never deign to touch.
 Ye gentle souls, who dream of rural ease,
 Whom the smooth stream and smoother sonnet
 please ;

Go ! if the peaceful cot your praises share,
 Go look within ; and ask if peace be there ;
 If peace be his—that drooping weary sire,
 Or theirs, that offspring round their feeble fire ;

Or hers, that matron pale, whose trembling hand
Turns on the wretched hearth th' expiring brand!

Nor yet can time itself obtain for these
Life's latest comforts, due respect and ease ;
For yonder see that hoary swain, whose age
Can with no cares except his own engage ;
Who, propt on that rude staff, looks up to see
The bare arms broken from the withering tree,
On which, a boy, he climb'd the loftiest bough,
Then his first joy, but his sad emblem now.
He once was chief in all the rustic trade ;
His steady hand the straightest furrow made ;
Full many a prize he won, and still is proud
To find the triumphs of his youth allow'd ;
A transient pleasure sparkles in his eyes,
He hears and smiles, then thinks again and sighs :

For now he journeys to his grave in pain ;
The rich disdain him ; nay, the poor disdain :
Alternate masters now their slave command,
Urge the weak efforts of his feeble hand,
And, when his age attempts its task in vain,
With ruthless taunts, of lazy poor complain.

Oft may you see him, when he tends the sheep,
His winter-charge, beneath the hillock weep ;
Oft hear him murmur to the winds that blow
O'er his white locks, and bury them in snow,
When, rous'd by rage and muttering in the morn,

He mends the broken hedge with icy thorn :—

“ Why do I live, when I desire to be
At once from life and life's long labour free ?
Like leaves in spring, the young are blown away,
Without the sorrows of a slow decay ;
I, like you wither'd leaf, remain behind,
Nipp'd by the frost and shivering in the wind :
There it abides till younger buds come on,
As I, now all my fellow-swains are gone ;
Then, from the rising generation thrust,
It falls, like me, unnoticed to the dust.

“ These fruitful fields, these numerous flocks I
see,
Are others' gain, but killing cares to me ;
To me the children of my youth are lords,
Cool in their looks, but hasty in their words :
Wants of their own demand their care ; and who Feels his own want, and succours others too ?
A lonely, wretched man, in pain I go,
None need my help and none relieve my woe ;
Then let my bones beneath the turf be laid,
And men forget the wretch they would not aid.”

Thus groan the old, till by disease oppress'd,
They taste a final woe, and then they rest.

Theirs is yon house that holds the parish poor,
Whose walls of mud scarce bear the broken
door ;
There, where the putrid vapours, flagging, play,

And the dull wheel hums doleful through the
day !—

Their children dwell who know no parents' care ;
Parents, who know no 'children's love, dwell
there !

Heart-broken matrons on their joyless bed,
Forsaken wives, and mothers never wed ;
Dejected widows with unheeded tears,
And crippled age with more than childhood
fears ;

The lame, the blind, and, far the happiest they !
The moping idiot, and the madman gay.

Here too the sick their final doom receive,
Here brought, amid the scenes of grief, to grieve,
Where the loud groans from some sad chamber
flow,

Mixt with the clamours of the crowd below ;
Here sorrowing, they each kindred sorrow scan,
And the cold charities of man to man :
Whose laws indeed for ruin'd age provide,
And strong compulsion plucks the scrap from pride ;

But still that scrap is bought with many a sigh,
And pride embitters what it can't deny.

Say ye, oppress by some fantastic woes,
Some jarring nerve that baffled your repose ;
Who press the downy couch, while slaves advance

With timid eye to read the distant glance ;
Who with sad prayers the weary doctor tease,
To name the nameless ever-new disease ;
Who with mock patience dire complaints endure,
Which real pain and that alone can cure ;
How would ye bear in real pain to lie,
Despis'd, neglected, left alone to die ?
How would ye bear to draw your latest breath,
Where all that's wretched paves the way for death ?

Such is that room which one rude beam divides,
And naked rafters from the sloping sides ;
Where the vile bands that bind the thatch are
seen,

And lath and mud are all that lie between ;
Save one dull pane, that, coarsely patch'd, gives way

To the rude tempest, yet excludes the day :
Here, on a matted flock, with dust o'erspread,
The drooping wretch reclines his languid head ;
For him no hand the cordial cup applies,
Or wipes the tear that stagnates in his eyes ;
No friends with soft discourse his pain beguile,
Or promise hope till sickness wears a smile.

But soon a loud and hasty summons calls,
Shakes the thin roof, and echoes round the walls ;
Anon, a figure enters, quaintly neat,
All pride and business, bustle and conceit ;
With looks unalter'd by these scenes of woe,
With speed that, entering, speaks his haste to go,

He bids the gazing throng around him fly,
And carries fate and physic in his eye :

A potent quack, long vers'd in human ills,
Who first insults the victim whom he kills;
Whose murd'rous hand a drowsy bench protect,
And whose most tender mercy is neglect.

Paid by the parish for attendance here,
He wears contempt upon his sapient sneer;
In haste he seeks the bed where misery lies,
Impatience mark'd in his averted eyes;
And, some habitual queries hurried o'er,
Without reply, he rushes on the door:
His drooping patient, long inur'd to pain,
And long unheeded, knows remonstrance vain;
He ceases now the feeble help to crave
Of man; and silent sinks into the grave.

But ere his death some pious doubts arise,
Some simple fears which "bold bad" men despise;

Fain would he ask the parish-priest to prove
His title certain to the joys above:
For this he sends the murmuring nurse, who calls

The holy stranger to these dismal walls:
And doth not he, the pious man, appear,
He, "passing rich with forty pounds a year?"
Ah! no; a shepherd of a different stock,
And far unlike him, feeds this little flock:
A jovial youth, who thinks his Sunday's task,
As much as God or man can fairly ask;
The rest he gives to loves and labours light,
To fields the morning and to feasts the night;
None better skill'd the noisy pack to guide,
To urge their chase, to cheer them or to chide;
A sportsman keen, he shoots through half the day,

And, skill'd at whist, devotes the night to play:
Then, while such honours bloom around his head,

Shall he sit sadly by the sick-man's bed,
To raise the hope he feels not, or with zeal
To combat fears that e'en the pious feel?

Now once again the gloomy scene explore,
Less gloomy now; the bitter hour is o'er,
The man of many sorrows sighs no more.—
Up yonder hill, behold how sadly slow
The bier moves winding from the vale below,
There lie the happy dead, from trouble free,
And the glad parish pays the frugal fee:
No more, O death! thy victim starts to hear
Churchwarden stern, or kingling overseer;
No more the farmer claims his humble bow,
Thou art his lord, the best of tyrants thou!

Now to the church behold the mourners come,
Sedately torpid and devoutly dumb;
The village-children now their games suspend,
To see the bier that bears their ancient friend:
For he was one in all their idle sport,
And like a monarch rul'd their little court;
The pliant bow he form'd, the flying ball,
The bat, the wicket, were his labours all;
Him now they follow to his grave, and stand

Silent and sad, and gazing; hand in hand;
While bending low, their eager eyes explore
The mingled relics of the parish-poor;
The bell tolls late, the moping owl flies round,
Fear marks the flight and magnifies the sound;
The busy priest, detain'd by weightier care,
Defers his duty till the day of prayer:
And, waiting long, the crowd retire distressed,
To think a poor-man's bones should lie unblest.

SIR EUSTACE GREY.

Scene:—A Madhouse.

Persons:—Visitor, Physician, and Patient.

VISITOR.

I'LL no more;—the heart is torn
By views of woe, we cannot heal;
Long shall I see these things forlorn,
And oft again their griefs shall feel,
As each upon the mind shall steal;
That wan projector's mystic style,
That lumpish idiot leering by,
That peevish idler's ceaseless wile,
And that poor maiden's half-form'd smile,
While struggling for the full-drawn sigh—
I'll know no more.

PHYSICIAN.

—Yes, turn again;
Then speed to happier scenes thy way,
When thou hast view'd, what yet remain,
The ruins of Sir Eustace Grey,
The sport of madness, misery's prey:
But he will no historian need,
His cares, his crimes will he display,
And show, (as one from frenzy freed)
The proud-lost mind, the rash-done deed.

That cell to him is Greyling Hall:—
Approach; he'll bid thee welcome there;
Will sometimes for his servant call;
And sometimes point the vacant chair:
He can, with free and easy air,
Appear attentive and polite;
Can veil his woes in manners fair,
And pity with respect excite.

PATIENT.

Who comes—Approach!—'tis kindly done:—
My learn'd physician, and a friend,
Their pleasures quit, to visit one,
Who cannot to their ease attend.
Nor joys bestow, nor comforts lend,
As when I liv'd so blest, so well,
And dreamt not I must soon contend
With those malignant powers of hell.

PHYSICIAN.

Less warmth, Sir Eustace, or we go.—

PATIENT.

See! I am calm as infant-love,
A very child, but one of woe,
Whom you should pity, not reprove:—
But men at ease, who never strove

With passions wild, will calmly show,
How soon we may their ills remove,
And masters of their madness grow.

Some twenty years I think are gone, —
(Time flies, I know not how, away.)
The sun upon no happier shone,
Nor prouder man, than Eustace Grey.
Ask where you would, and all would say,
The man admir'd and prais'd of all,
By rich and poor, by grave and gay,
Was the young lord of Greyling Hall.

Yes! I had youth and rosy health;
Was nobly form'd as man might be;
For sickness then, of all my wealth,
I never gave a single fee:
The ladies fair, the maidens free,
Were all accusom'd then to say,
Who would a handsome figure see,
Should look upon Sir Eustace Grey.

He had a frank and pleasant look,
A cheerful eye and accent bland;
His very speech and manner spoke
The generous heart, the open hand;
About him all was gay, or grand,
He had the praise of great and small;
He bought, improv'd, projected, plann'd,
And reign'd a prince at Greyling Hall.

My lady — she was all we love;
All praise (to speak her worth) is faint;
Her manners shew'd the yielding dove,
Her morals, the seraphic saint:
She never breath'd nor look'd complaint;
No equal upon earth had she: —
Now, what is this fair thing I paint?
Alas! as all that live, shall be.

There was, beside, a gallant youth,
And him my bosom's friend, I had: —
Oh! I was rich — in very truth,
It made me proud — it made me mad! —
Yes, I was lost — but there was cause! —
Where stood my tale? — I cannot find —
But I had all mankind's applause,
And all the smiles of womankind.

There were two cherub-things beside,
A gracious girl, a glorious boy;
Yet more to swell my full-blown pride,
To varnish higher my fading joy,
Pleasures were ours without alloy,
Nay paradise, — till my frail Eve
Our bliss was tempted to destroy;
Deceiv'd and fated to deceive.

But I deserv'd; for all that time,
When I was lov'd, admir'd, caress'd,
There was within, each secret crime,
Unfelt, uncancell'd, unconfess'd:

I never then my God address'd,
In grateful praise or humble prayer;
And if his word was not my jest,
(Dread thought!) it never was my care.

I doubted: — fool I was to doubt!
If that all-piercing eye could see, —
If He who looks all worlds throughout,
Would so minute and careful be,
As to perceive and punish me: —
With man I would be great and high,
But with my God so lost, that He,
In his large view, should pass me by.

Thus blest with children, friend, and wife,
Blest far beyond the vulgar lot,
Of all that gladdens human life,
Where was the good, that I had not?
But my vile heart had sinful spot,
And heaven beheld its deepning stain,
Eternal justice I forgot,
And mercy sought not to obtain.

Come near, — I'll softly speak the rest! —
Alas! 'tis known to all the crowd,
Her guilty love was all confess'd;
And his, who so much truth avow'd,
My faithless friend's. — In pleasure proud
I sat, when these curs'd tidings came;
Their guilt, their flight was told aloud,
And envy smil'd to hear my shame!

I call'd on Vengeance; at the word
She came: — can I the deed forget?
I held the sword; th' accus'd sword,
The blood of his false heart made wet:
And that fair victim paid her debt,
She pin'd, she died, she loath'd to live; —
I saw her dying — see her yet:
Fair fallen thing! my rage forgive!

Those cherubs still, my life to bless,
Were left, could I my fears remove,
Sad fears that check'd each fond caress,
And poison'd all parental love.
Yet that with jealous feelings strove,
And would at last have won my will,
Had I not, wretch! been doom'd to prove,
Th' extremes of mortal good and ill.

In youth! health! joy! in beauty's pride!
They droop'd: as flowers, when blighted bow,
The dire infection came: — They died,
And I was curs'd — as I am now —
Nay, frown not, angry friend, — allow
That I was deeply, sorely tried;
Hear then, and you must wonder how
I could such storms and strifes abide.

Storms! — not that clouds embattled make,
When they afflict this earthly globe;
But such as with their terrors shake
Man's breast, and to the bottom probe;

They make the hypocrite disrobe,
 They try us all, if false or true ;
 For this, one devil had pow'r on Job ;
 And I was long the slave of two.

PHYSICIAN.

Peace, peace, my friend, these subjects fly ;
 Collect thy thoughts—go calmly on.—

PATIENT.

And shall I then the fact deny ?
 I was,—thou know'st,—I was begone,
 Like him who fill'd the eastern throne,
 To whom the watcher cried aloud ;
 That royal wretch of Babylon,
 Who was so guilty and so proud.

Like him, with haughty, stubborn mind,
 I, in my state, my comforts sought ;
 Delight and praise I hop'd to find,
 In what I builded, planted, bought !
 Oh ! arrogance ! by misery taught—
 Soon came a voice ; I felt it come ;
 " Full be his cup, with evil fraught,
 Demons his guides, and death his doom !"

Then was I cast from out my state ;
 Two fiends of darkness led my way ;
 They wak'd me early, watch'd me late,
 My dread by night, my plague by day !
 Oh ! I was made their sport, their play,
 Through many a stormy troubled year ;
 And how they us'd their passive prey,
 Is sad to tell :—but you shall hear.

And first, before they sent me forth,
 Through this unpitied world to run,
 They robb'd Sir Eustace of his worth,
 Lands, manors, lordships, every one ;
 So was that gracious man undone,
 Was spurn'd as vile, was scorn'd as poor,
 Whom every former friend would shun,
 And menials drove from every door.

Then those ill-favour'd ones, whom none
 But my unhappy eyes could view,
 Led me, with wild emotion, on,
 And with resistless terror, drew.
 Through lands we fled, o'er seas we flew,
 And halted on a boundless plain ;
 Where nothing fed, nor breath'd, nor grew,
 But silence rul'd the still domain.

Upon that boundless plain, below,
 The setting sun's last rays were shed,
 And gave a mild and sober glow,
 Where all were still, asleep or dead ;
 Vast ruins in the midst were spread,
 Pillars and pediments sublime,
 Where the grey moss had form'd a bed,
 And cloth'd the crumbling spoils of time.

There was I fix'd, I know not how,
 Condemn'd for untold years to stay ;
 Yet years were not ;—one dreadful now
 Endur'd no change of night or day ;

The same mild evening's sleeping ray
 Shone softly—solemn and serene,
 And all that time, I gaz'd away,
 The setting sun's sad rays were seen.

At length a moment's sleep stole on,—
 Again came my commission'd foes ;
 Again through sea and land were gone,
 No peace, no respite, no repose :
 Above the dark broad sea we rose,
 We ran through bleak and frozen land ;
 I had no strength, their strength t' oppose,
 An infant in a giant's hand.

They plac'd me where those streamers play.
 Those nimble beams of brilliant light ;
 It would the stoutest heart dismay,
 To see, to feel, that dreadful sight :
 So swift, so pure, so cold, so bright,
 They pierc'd my frame with icy wound,
 And all that half-year's polar night,
 Those dancing streamers wrapt me round.

Slowly that darkness pass'd away,
 When down upon the earth I fell,—
 Some hurried sleep was mine by day ;
 But, soon as toll'd the evening bell,
 They forc'd me on, wherever dwell
 Far-distant men in cities fair,
 Cities of whom no travellers tell,
 Nor feet but mine were wanderers there.

Their watchmen stare, and stand aghast,
 As on we hurry through the dark ;
 The watch-light blinks, as we go past,
 The watch-dog shrinks and fears to bark ;
 The watch-tower's bell sounds shrill ; and,
 hark !
 The free wind blows—we've left the town—
 A wide sepulchral ground I mark,
 And on a tombstone place me down.

What monuments of mighty dead !
 What tombs of various kinds are found !
 And stones erect their shadows shed
 On humble graves, with wickers bound ;
 Some risen fresh, above the ground,
 Some level with the native clay,
 What sleeping millions wait the sound,
 " Arise, ye dead, and come away !"

Alas ! they stay not for that call ;
 Spare me this woe ! ye demons spare !—
 They come ! the shrowded shadows all,—
 'Tis more than mortal brain can bear ;
 Rustling they rise, they sternly glare
 At man upheld by vital breath ;
 Who, led by wicked fiends, should dare
 To join the shadowy troops of death !

Yes ! I have felt all man can feel,
 Till he shall pay his nature's debt ;
 Ills that no hope has strength to heal,
 No mind the comfort to forget :

Whatever cares the heart can fret,
The spirits wear, the temper gall,
Woe, want, dread, anguish, all beset
My sinful soul!—together all!

Those fiends upon a shaking fen
Fix'd me in dark tempestuous night;
There never trod the foot of men,
There flock'd the fowl in wintry flight;
There danc'd the moor's deceitful light,
Above the pool where sedges grow;
And when the morning sun shone bright,
It shone upon a field of snow.

They lung me on a bough, so small,
The rook could build her nest no higher;
They fix'd me on the trembling ball,
That crowns the steeple's quiv'ring spire;
They set me where the seas retire,
But down with their returning tide;
And made me flee the mountain's fire,
When rolling from its burning side.

I've hung upon the ridgy steep
Of cliffs, and held the rambling brier;
I've plung'd below the billowy deep,
Where air was sent me to respire;
I've been where hungry wolves retire;
And (to complete my woes) I've ran
Where Bedlam's crazy crew conspire
Again the life of reasoning man.

I've fuil'd in storms the flapping sail,
By hanging from the top-mast-head;
I've serv'd the vilest slaves in jail,
And pick'd the dunghill's spoil for bread;
I've made the badger's hole my bed,
I've wander'd with a gipsy crew;
I've dreaded all the guilty dread,
And done what they would fear to do.

On sand where ebbs and flows the flood,
Midway they plac'd and bade me die;
Propt on my staff, I stoutly stood
When the swift waves came rolling by;
And high they rose, and still more high,
Till my lips drank the bitter brine;
I sobb'd convuls'd, then cast mine eye
And saw the tide's re-flowing sign.

And then, my dreams were such as nought
Could yield but my unhappy case;
I've been of thousand devils caught,
And thrust into that horrid place,
Where reign dismay, despair, disgrace;
Furies with iron fangs were there,
To torture that accursed race,
Doom'd to dismay, disgrace, despair.

Harmless I was; yet hunted down
For treasons, to my soul unfit;
I've been pursu'd through many a town,
For crimes that petty knaves commit;

I've been adjudg'd t' have lost my wit,
Because I preach'd so loud and well,
And thrown into the dungeon's pit,
For trampling on the pit of hell.

Such were the evils, man of sin,
That I was fated to sustain;
And add to all, without—within,
A soul defil'd with every stain,
That man's reflecting mind can pain;
That pride, wrong, rage, despair can make;
In fact, they'd nearly touch'd my brain,
And reason on her throne would shake.

But pity will the vilest seek,
If punish'd guilt will not repine,—
I heard a heavenly teacher speak,
And felt the sun of mercy shine:
I hail'd the light! the birth divine!
And then was seal'd among the few;
Those angry fiends beheld the sign,
And from me in an instant flew,

Come hear how thus the charmers cry
To wandering sheep, the strays of sin;
While some the wicket-gate pass by,
And some will knock and enter in:
Full joyful 'tis a soul to win,
For he that winneth souls is wise;
Now hark! the holy strains begin,
And thus the sainted preacher cries:—

“Pilgrim, burthen'd with thy sin,
“Come the way to Zion's gate,
“There, till mercy let thee in,
“Knock and weep and watch and wait.
“Knock!—He knows the sinner's cry:
“Weep!—He loves the mourner's tears:
“Watch!—for saving grace is nigh:
“Wait,—till heavenly light appears.

“Hark! it is the bridegroom's voice;
“Welcome, pilgrim to thy rest;
“Now within the gate rejoice,
“Safe and seal'd and bought and blest!
“Safe—from all the lures of vice,
“Seal'd—by signs the chosen know,
“Bought—by love, and life the price,
“Blest—the mighty debt to owe.

“Holy Pilgrim! what for thee,
“In a world like this remain?
“From thy guarded breast shall flee,
“Fear and shame, and doubt and pain.
“Fear—the hope of Heaven shall fly,
“Shame—from glory's view retire,
“Doubt—in certain rapture die,
“Pain—in endless bliss expire.”

But though my day of grace was come,
Yet still my days of grief I find;
The former clouds' collected gloom
Still sadden the reflecting mind;

The soul, to evil things consign'd,
Will of their evil some retain;
The man will seem to earth inclin'd,
And will not look erect again.

Thus, though elect, I feel it hard,
To lose what I possess'd before,
To be from all my wealth debarr'd,—
The brave Sir Eustace is no more:
But old I wax and passing poor,
Stern, rugged men my conduct view,
They chide my wish, they bar my door,
'Tis hard, I weep, you see I do.—

Must you, my friends, no longer stay?
Thus quickly all my pleasures end!
But I'll remember, when I pray,
My kind physician and his friend;
And those sad hours, you deign to spend
With me, I shall requite them all;
Sir Eustace for his friends shall send,
And thank their love at Greyling Hall.

VISITOR.

The poor Sir Eustace!—Yet his hope
Leads him to think of joys again;
And when his earthly visions droop,
His views of heavenly kin remain:—
But whence that meek and humbled strain,
That spirit wounded, lost, resign'd;
Would not so proud a soul disdain
The madness of the poorest mind?

PHYSICIAN.

No! for the more he swell'd with pride,
The more he felt misfortune's blow;
Disgrace and grief he could not hide,
And poverty had laid him low:
Thus shame and sorrow working slow,
At length this humble spirit gave;
Madness on these began to grow,
And bound him to his fiends a slave.

Though the wild thoughts had touch'd his brain,

Then was he free:—So, forth he ran;
To soothe or threat, alike were vain:
He spake of fiends; look'd wild and wan;
Year after year, the hurried man
Obey'd those fiends from place to place;
Till his religious change began
To form a frenzied child of grace.

For, as the fury lost its strength,
The mind repos'd; by slow degrees,
Came lingering hope, and brought at length,
To the tormented spirit, ease:

This slave of sin, whom fiends could seize,
Felt or believ'd their power had end;—
" 'Tis faith," he cried, " my bosom frees,
" And now my Saviour is my friend."

But ah! though time can yield relief,
And soften woes it cannot cure;
Would we not suffer pain and grief,
To have our reason sound and sure?

Then let us keep our bosoms pure,
Our fancy's favourite flights suppress;
Prepare the body to endure,
And bend the mind to meet distress;
And then His guardian care implore,
Whom demons dread and men adore.

THE RIME OF THE ANCIENT MARINER.

[In seven Parts.]

PART I.

It is an ancient Mariner,
And he stoppeth one of three;
" By the long grey beard and glittering eye,
Now wherefore stopp'st thou me?"

The bridegroom's doors are open'd wide,
And I am next of kin;
The guests are met, the feast is set:
Mays't hear the merry din."

He holds him with his skinny hand,
" There was a ship," quoth he.
" Hold off! unhand me, grey-beard loon!"
Eftsoons his hand dropt he.

He holds him with his glittering eye—
The wedding-guest stood still,
And listens like a three years' child:
The Mariner hath his will.

The wedding-guest sat on a stone:
He cannot chuse but hear;
And thus spake on that ancient man,
The bright-eyed Mariner.

" The ship was cheer'd, the harbour clear'd,
Merrily did we drop
Below the kirk, below the hill,
Below the light-house top.

The sun came up upon the left,
Out of the sea came he;
And he shone bright, and on the right
Went down into the sea.

Higher and higher every day,
Till over the mast at noon"—
The wedding-guest here beat his breast,
For he heard the loud bassoon.

The bride hath paced into the hall,
Red as a rose is she;
Nodding their heads before her goes
The merry minstrelsy.

The wedding-guest he beat his breast,
Yet he cannot chuse but hear ;
And thus spake on that ancient man,
The bright-eyed Mariner.

“ And now the storm-blast came, and he
Was tyrannous and strong :
He struck with his o’ertaking winds,
And chased us south along.

With sloping masts and dipping prow,
As who pursued with yell and blow
Still treads the shadow of his foe,
And forward bends his head,
The ship drove fast, loud roar’d the blast,
And southward aye we fled.

And now there came both mist and snow,
And it grew wonderous cold :
And ice, mast-high, came floating by,
As green as emerald.

And through the drift the snowy clift,
Did send a dismal sheen :
Nor shape of men nor beasts we ken—
The ice was all between.

The ice was here, the ice was there,
The ice was all around :
It cracked and growled, and roar’d and howl’d,
Like noises in a swound !

At length did cross an albatross :
Thorough the fog it came ;
As if it had been a christian soul,
We hailed it in God’s name.

It ate the food it ne’er had eat,
And round and round it flew.
The ice did split with a thunder-fit ;
The helmsman steer’d us through !

And a good south wind sprung up behind ;
The albatross did follow,
And every day, for food or play,
Came to the Mariner’s hollo !

In mist or cloud, on mast or shroud,
It perch’d for vespers nine ;
Whilst all the night, through fog-smoke white,
Glimmered the white moon-shine.

“ God save thee, ancient Mariner !
From the fiends that plague thee thus !—
Why look’st thou so ? ”—With my cross-bow
I shot the albatross !

PART II.

The sun now rose upon the right :
Out of the sea came he,
Still hid in mist, and on the left
Went down into the sea.

And the good south wind still blew behind,
But no sweet bird did follow,
Nor any day for food or play
Came to the Mariner’s hollo !

And I had done an hellish thing,
And it would work ’em woe :
For all averred I had killed the bird
That made the breeze to blow.
Ah wretch ! said they, the bird to slay,
That made the breeze to blow !

Nor dim nor red, like God’s own head,
The glorious sun uprist :
They all averred I had killed the bird
That brought the fog and mist.
’Twas right, said they, such birds to slay,
That bring the fog and mist.

The fair breeze blew, the white foam flew,
The furrow stream’d off free :
We were the first that ever burst
Into that silent sea.

Down dropt the breeze, the sails dropt down,
’Twas sad as sad could be ;
And we did speak only to break
The silence of the sea !

All in a hot and copper sky,
The bloody sun, at noon,
Right up above the mast did stand,
No bigger than the moon.

Day after day, day after day,
We stuck, nor breath nor motion,
As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean.

Water, water, every where,
And all the boards did shrink ;
Water, water, every where,
Nor any drop to drink.

The very deep did rot : O Christ !
That ever this should be !
Yea, slimy things did crawl with legs
Upon the slimy sea.

About, about, in reel and rout
The death-fires danced at night ;
The water, like a witch’s oils,
Burnt green, and blue and white.

And some in dreams assured were
Of the spirit that plagued us so :
Nine fathom deep he had followed us
From the land of mist and snow.

And every tongue, through utter drought,
Was wither’d at the root ;
We could not speak, no more than if
We had been choak’d with soot.

Ah ! well a-day ! what evil looks
Had I from old and young !
Instead of the cross, the albatross
About my neck was hung.

PART III.

There passed a weary time. Each throat
Was parched, and glazed each eye.
A weary time ! a weary time !
How glazed each weary eye !
When looking westward, I beheld
A something in the sky.

At first it seem'd a little speck,
And then it seem'd a mist :
It moved and moved, and took at last
A certain shape, I wist.

A speck, a mist, a shape, I wist !
And still it near'd and near'd :
And as if it dodged a water-sprite,
It plunged and tack'd and veer'd.

With throat unslack'd, with black lips baked,
We could nor laugh nor wail ;
Through utter drought all dumb we stood !
I bit my arm. I sucked the blood,
And cried, "A sail ! a sail !"

With throat unslacked, with black lips baked,
Agape they heard me call :
Gramercy ! they for joy did grin,
And all at once their breath drew in,
As they were drinking all.

See ! see ! (I cried) she tacks no more !
Hither to work us weal ;
Without a breeze, without a tide,
She steadies with upright keel !

The western wave was all a-flame.
The day was well nigh done !
Almost upon the western wave
Rested the broad bright sun ;
When that strange shape drove suddenly
Betwixt us and the sun.

And straight the sun was flecked with bars,
(Heaven's mother send us grace !)
As if through a dungeon-grate he peer'd,
With broad and burning face.

Alas ! (thought I, and my heart beat loud)
How fast she nears and nears !
Are those her sails that glance in the sun,
Like restless gossameres !

Are those her ribs through which the sun
Did peer, as through a grate ?
And is that woman all her crew ?
Is that a Death ? and are there two ?
Is Death that woman's mate ?

Her lips were red, her looks were free,
Her locks were yellow as gold :
Her skin was as white as leprosy,
The Night-mare Life-in-Death was she,
Who thicks man's blood with cold.

The naked hulk alongside came,
And the twain were casting dice ;
" The game is done ! I've won, I've won !"
Quoth she, and whistles thrice.

A gust of wind stertere up behind
And whistled through his bones ;
Through the holes of his eyes and the hole of his mouth,
Half whistles and half groans.

The sun's rim dips ; the stars rush out :
At one stride comes the dark ;
With far-heard whisper, o'er the sea,
Off shot the spectre-bark.

We listen'd and look'd sideways up !
Fear at my heart, as at a cup,
My life-blood seem'd to sip !
The stars were dim, and thick the night,
The steersman's face by his lamp gleam'd white ;
From the sails the dews did drip—
Till clombe above the eastern bar
The horned moon, with one bright star
Within the nether tip.

One after one, by the star dogg'd moon
Too quick for groan or sigh,
Each turn'd his face with a ghastly pang,
And curs'd me with his eye.

Four times fifty living men,
(And I heard nor sigh nor groan)
With heavy thumb, a lifeless lump,
They dropped down one by one.

The souls did from their bodies fly,—
They fled to bliss or woe !
And every soul, it passed me by,
Like the whiz of my cross-bow !

PART IV.

" I fear thee, ancient Mariner !
I fear thy skinny hand !
And thou art long, and lank, and brown,
As is the ribbed sea-sand.

I fear thee and thy glittering eye,
And thy skinny hand, so brown."—
Fear not, fear not, thou wedding-guest !
This body dropt not down.

Alone, alone, all, all alone,
Alone on a wide wide sea !
And never a saint took pity on
My soul in agony.

The many men, so beautiful !
And they all dead did lie :
And a thousand thousand slimy things
Liv'd on ; and so did I.

I look'd upon the rotting sea,
And drew my eyes away ;
I look'd upon the rotting deck,
And there the dead men lay.

I look'd to Heaven, and tried to pray ;
But or ever a prayer had gusht,
A wicked whisper came, and made
My heart as dry as dust.

I closed my lids, and kept them close,
And the balls like pulses beat :
For the sky and the sea, and the sea and the sky
Lay, like a cloud, on my weary eye,
And the dead were at my feet.

The cold sweat melted from their limbs,
Nor rot nor reek did they :
The look with which they look'd on me
Had never pass'd away.

An orphan's curse would drag to hell
A spirit from on high :
But oh ! more horrible than that
Is the cur e 'n a dead man's eye !
Seven days, seven nights, I saw that curse,
And yet I could not die.

The moving moon went up the sky,
And no where did abide :
Softly she was going up,
And a star or two beside—

Her beams bemoock'd the sultry main,
Like April hoar-frost spread ;
But where the ship's huge shadow lay,
The charmed water burnt alway
A still and awful red.

Beyond the shadow of the ship,
I watch'd the water-snakes :
They mov'd in tracks of shining white,
And when they reared, the elfish light
Fell off in hoary flakes.

Within the shadow of the ship
I watch'd their rich attire :
Blue, glossy green, and velvet black,
They coiled and swam ; and every track
Was a flash of golden fire.

O happy living things ! no tongue
Their beauty might declare :
A spring of love gusht from my heart,
And I blessed them unaware !
Sure my kind saint took pity on me,
And I blessed them unaware.

The self same moment I could pray ;
And from my neck so free
The albatross fell off, and sank
Like lead into the sea.

PART V.

O sleep ! it is a gentle thing,
Belov'd from pole to pole !
To Mary Queen the praise be given !
She sent the gentle sleep from Heaven,
That slid into my soul.

The silly buckets on the deck,
That had so long remained,
I dreamt that they were filled with dew ;
And when I awoke, it rained.

My lips were wet, my throat was cold,
My garments all were dank ;
Sure I had drunken in my dreams,
And still my body drank.

I moved, and could not feel my limbs :
I was so light—almost
I thought that I had died in sleep,
And was a blessed ghost.

And soon I heard a roaring wind :
It did not come anear ;
But with its sound it shook the sails,
That were so thin and sere.

The upper air burst into life !
And a hundred fire-flags sheen,
To and fro they were hurried about ;
And to and fro, and in and out,
The wan stars danced between.

And the coming wind did roar more loud,
And the sails did sigh like sedge ;
And the rain pour'd down from one black cloud ;
The moon was at its edge.

The thick black cloud was cleft, and still
The moon was at its side :
Like waters shot from some high crag,
The lightning fell with never a jag,
A river steep and wide.

The loud wind never reached the ship,
Yet now the ship moved on !
Beneath the lightning and the moon
The dead men gave a groan.

They groan'd, they stirr'd, they all uprose,
Nor spake, nor moved their eyes ;
It had been strange, even in a dream,
To have seen those dead men rise.

The helmsman steered, the ship moved on ;
Yet never a breeze up blew ;

The mariners all 'gan work the ropes,
 Were they were wont to do :
 They raised their limbs like lifeless tools—
 We were a ghastly crew.

The body of my brother's son
 Stood by me, knee to knee :
 The body and I pulled at one rope,
 But he said nought to me.

" I fear thee, ancient mariner !"
 Be calm thou, wedding-guest !
 'Twas not those souls that fled in pain,
 Which to their corpses came again,
 But a troop of spirits blest :

For when it dawned—they dropped their arms,
 And clustered round the mast ;
 Sweet sounds rose slowly through their mouths,
 And from their bodies passed.

Around, around, flew each sweet sound ;
 Then darted to the sun ;
 Slowly the sounds came back again,
 Now mixed, now one by one.

Sometimes a-dropping from the sky
 I heard the sky-lark sing ;
 Sometimes all little birds that are,
 How they seem'd to fill the sea and air
 With their sweet jargoning !

And now 'twas like all instruments,
 Now like a lonely flute ;
 And now it is an angel's song,
 That makes the heavens be mute.

It ceased ; yet still the sails made on
 A pleasant noise till noon,
 A noise like of a hidden brook
 In the leafy month of June,
 That to the sleeping woods all night
 Singeth a quiet tune.

Till noon we quietly sailed on,
 Yet never a breeze did breathe :
 Slowly and smoothly went the ship,
 Moved onward from beneath.

Under the keel nine fathom deep,
 From the land of mist and snow,
 The spirit slid : and it was he
 That made the ship to go.
 The sails at noon left off their tune,
 And the ship stood still also.

The sun, right above the mast,
 Had fixt her to the ocean ;
 But in a minute she 'gan stir,
 With a short uneasy motion—
 Backwards and forwards half her length,
 With a short uneasy motion,

Then like a pawing horse let go,
 She made a sudden bound :
 It flung the blood into my head,
 And I fell down in a swoond.

How long in that same fit I lay,
 I have not to declare ;
 But ere my living life returned,
 I heard and in my soul discerned
 Two voices in the air.

" Is it he ?" quoth one, " Is this the man ?
 By him who died on cross,
 With his cruel bow he laid full low,
 The harmless albatross.

The spirit who bideth by himself
 In the land of mist and snow ;
 He loved the bird that loved the man
 Who shot him with his bow."

The other was a softer voice,
 As soft as honey-dew :
 Quoth he, " The man hath penance done,
 And penance more will do."

PART VI.

FIRST VOICE.

But tell me, tell me ! speak again,
 Thy soft response renewing—
 What makes that ship drive on so fast ?
 What is the ocean doing ?

SECOND VOICE.

Still as a slave before his lord,
 The ocean hath no blast ;
 His great bright eye most silently
 Up to the moon is cast—

If he may know which way to go ;
 For she guides him smooth or grim.
 See, brother, see ! how graciously
 She looketh down on him.

FIRST VOICE.

But why drives on that ship so fast,
 Without or wave or wind ?

SECOND VOICE.

The air is cut away before,
 And closes from behind.

Fly, brother, fly ! more high, more high !
 Or we shall be belated :
 For slow and slow that ship will go,
 When the mariner's trance is abated."

I woke, and we were sailing on
 As in a gentle weather :
 'Twas night, calm night, the moon was high ;
 The dead men stood together.

All stood together on the deck,
For a charnel-dungeon fitter:
All fixed on me their stony eyes,
That in the moon did glitter.

The pang, the curse, with which they died,
Had never passed away:
I could not draw my eyes from theirs,
Nor turn them up to pray.

And now this spell was snapt: once more
I viewed the ocean green,
And looked far forth, yet little saw
Of what had else been seen—

Like one, that on a lonesome road
Doth walk in fear and dread,
And having once turn'd round, walks on,
And turns no more his head;
Because he knows a frightful fiend
Doth close behind him tread.

But soon there breathed a wind on me,
Nor sound nor motion made:
Its path was not upon the sea,
In ripple or in shade.

It raised my hair, it fanned my cheek,
Like a meadow-gale of spring—
It mingled strangely with my fears,
Yet it felt like a welcoming.

Swiftly, swiftly, flew the ship,
Yet she sailed softly too:
Sweetly, sweetly, blew the breeze—
On me alone it blew.

Oh! dream of joy! is this indeed
The light-house top I see?
Is this the hill? is this the kirk?
Is this mine own countree?

We drifted o'er the harbour-bar,
And I with sobs did pray—
O let me be awake, my God!
Or let me sleep alway.

The harbour-bay was clear as glass,
So smoothly it was strewn!
And on the bay the moonlight lay,
And the shadow of the moon.

The rock shone bright, the kirk no less,
That stands above the rock:
The moonlight steeped in silentness
The steady weathercock.

And the bay was white with silent light,
Till rising from the same,
Full many shapes, that shadows were,
In crimson colours came.

A little distance from the prow
Those crimson shadows were,
I turned my eyes upon the deck—
Oh, Christ! what saw I there!

Each corse lay flat, lifeless and flat,
And, by the holy rood!
A man all light, a seraph-man,
On every corse there stood.

This seraph-band, each waved his hand:
It was a heavenly sight!
They stood as signals to the land,
Each one a lovely light:

This seraph-band, each waved his hand,
No voice did they impart—
No voice; but oh! the silence sank
Like music on my heart.

But soon I heard the dash of oars,
I heard the pilot's cheer;
My head was turn'd perforce away,
And I saw a boat appear.

The pilot, and the pilot's boy,
I heard them coming fast:
Dear Lord in heaven! it was a joy
The dead men could not blast.

I saw a third—I heard his voice:
It is the hermit good!
He singeth loud his godly hymns
That he makes in the wood.
He'll shrieve my soul, he'll wash away
The albatross's blood.

PART VII.

This hermit good lives in that wood
Which slopes down to the sea.
How loudly his sweet voice he rears!
He loves to talk with marineres
That come from a far countree.

He kneels at morn, and noon and eve—
He hath a cushion plump:
It is the moss that wholly hides
The rotted old oak-stump.

The skiff-boat near'd: I heard them talk,
"Why this is strange, I trow!
Where are those lights so many and fair,
That signal made but now?"

"Strange, by my faith!" the hermit said—
"And they answered not our cheer!
The planks look warped! and see those sails,
How thin they are and sere!
I never saw ought like to them,
Unless perchance it were

The skeletons of leaves that lag
My forest-brook along :
When the ivy-toe is heavy with snow,
And the owlet whoops to the wolf below,
That eats the she-wolf's young."

Dear Lord ! it hath a fiendish look—
(The pilot made reply)
I am a-feared—Push on, push on !
Said the hermit cheerily.

The boat came closer to the ship,
But I nor spake nor stirred ;
The boat came close beneath the ship,
And straight a sound was heard.

Under the water it rumbled on,
Still louder and more dread :
It reach'd the ship, it split the bay ;
The ship went down like lead.

Stunned by that loud and dreadful sound,
Which sky and ocean smote,
Like one that hath been seven days drown'd,
My body lay afloat ;
But swift as dreams, myself I found
Within the pilot's boat.

Upon the whirl, where sank the ship,
The boat spun round and round ;
And all was still, save that the hill
Was telling of the sound.

I moved my lips—the pilot shrieked
And fell down in a fit ;
The holy hermit raised his eyes,
And prayed where he did sit.

I took the oars : the pilot's boy,
Who now doth crazy go,
Laughed loud and long, and all the while
His eyes went to and fro.
" Ha ! ha !" quoth he, " full plain I see,
The devil knows how to row."

And now, all in my own countree,
I stood on the firm land !
The hermit stepped forth from the boat,
And scarcely he could stand.

" O shrieve me, shrieve me, holy man !"
The hermit cross'd his brow.
" Say quick," quoth he, " I bid thee say—
What manner of man art thou ?"

Forthwith this frame of mine was wrench'd
With a woeful agony,
Which forced me to begin my tale ;
And then it left me free.

Since then at an uncertain hour,
That agony returns ;
And till my ghastly tale is told,
This heart within me burns.

I pass, like night, from land to land ;
I have strange power of speech ;
That moment that his face I see,
I know the man that must hear me :
To him my tale I teach.

What loud uproar bursts from that door !
The wedding-guests are there ;
But in the garden-bower the bride
And bride-maids singing are ;
And hark the little vesper bell,
Which biddeth me to prayer !

O wedding-guest ! this soul hath been
Alone on a wide wide sea :
So lonely 'twas, that God himself
Scarce seemed there to be.

O sweeter than the marriage-feast,
'Tis sweeter far to me,
To walk together to the kirk
With a goodly company !—

To walk together to the kirk,
And all together pray,
While each to his great Father bends,
Old men, and babes, and loving friends,
And youths and maidens gay !

Farewell, farewell ! but this I tell
To thee, thou wedding-guest !
He prayeth well, who loveth well
Both man and bird and beast.

He prayeth best, who loveth best
All things both great and small ;
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all.

The mariner, whose eye is bright,
Whose beard with age is hoar,
Is gone ; and now the wedding-guest
Turned from the bridegroom's door.

He went like one that hath been stunned,
And is of sense forlorn :
A sadder and a wiser man,
He rose the morrow morn.

LOVE.

ALL thoughts, all passions, all delights
Whatever stirs this mortal frame,
Are all but ministers of Love,
And feed his sacred flame.

Oft in my waking dreams do I
Live o'er again that happy hour,
When midway on the mount I lay,
Beside the ruin'd tower.

The moonshine, stealing o'er the scene,
Had blended with the lights of eve ;
And she was there, my hope, my joy,
My own dear Genevieve !

She leant against the armed man,
The statue of the armed knight ;
She stood and listen'd to my lay,
Amid the lingering light.

Few sorrows hath she of her own
My hope ! my joy ! my Genevieve !
She loves me best, whene'er I sing
The songs that make her grieve.

I play'd a soft and doleful air,
I sang an old and moving story—
An old rude song, that suited well
That ruin wild and hoary.

She listen'd with a fitting blush,
With downcast eyes and modest grace,
For well she knew, I could not chuse
But gaze upon her face.

I told her of the knight that wore
Upon his shield a burning brand ;
And that for ten long years he woo'd
The lady of the land.

I told her how he pin'd ; and ah !
The deep, the low, the pleading tone
With which I sang another's love,
Interpreted my own.

She listen'd with a fitting blush,
With downcast eyes, and modest grace ;
And she forgave me, that I gazed
Too fondly on her face !

But when I told the cruel scorn
That craz'd that bold and lovely knight,
And that he cross'd the mountain-woods,
Nor rested day nor night ;

That sometimes from the savage den,
And sometimes from the darksome shade,
And sometimes starting up at once
In green and sunny glade,

There came and look'd him in the face
An angel beautiful and bright ;
And that he knew it was a fiend,
This miserable knight !

And that unknowing what he did,
He leap'd amid a murderous band,
And sav'd from outrage worse than death
The lady of the land !

And how she wept, and claspt his knees ;
And how she tended him in vain—
And ever strove to expiate
The scorn that crazed his brain ;

And that she nursed him in a cave ;
And how his madness went away,
When on the yellow forest-leaves
A dying man he lay ;

His dying words—but when I reach'd
That tenderest strain of all the ditty,
My faltering voice and pausing harp
Disturb'd her soul with pity !

All impulses of soul and sense
Had thrill'd my guileless Genevieve ;
The music, and the doleful tale,
The rich and balmy eve ;

And hopes, and fears that kindle hope,
An undistinguishable throng,
And gentle wishes long subdued,
Subdued and cherish'd long !

She wept with pity and delight,
She blush'd with love, and virgin-shame ;
And like the murmur of a dream,
I heard her breathe my name.

Her bosom heav'd—she slept aside,
As conscious of my look she slept—
Then suddenly, with timorous eye,
She fled to me and wept.

She half enclosed me with her arms,
She press'd me with a meek embrace ;
And bending back her head, look'd up,
And gazed upon my face.

'Twas partly love, and partly fear,
And partly 'twas a bashful art,
That I might rather feel, than see,
The swelling of her heart.

I calm'd her fears, and she was calm,
And told her love with virgin-pride ;
And so I won my Genevieve,
My bright and beauteous bride.

FRANCE.

An Ode.

I.

Ye clouds ! that far above me float and pause,
Whose pathless march no mortal may control !

Ye ocean waves ! that, wheresoe'er ye roll,
Yield homage only to eternal laws !
Ye woods ! that listen to the night-birds' sing-
ing,

Midway the smooth and perilous slope reclined,
Save when your own imperious branches swing-
ing,

Have made a solemn music of the wind !
Where, like a man beloved of God,
Through glooms which never woodman trod,

How oft, pursuing fancies holy,
My moonlight way o'er flowering weeds I wound,
Inspired, beyond the guess of folly,
By each rude shape and wild unconquerable
sound!

O ye loud waves! and O ye forests high!
And O ye clouds that far above me soar'd!
Thou rising sun! thou blue rejoicing sky!
Yea, every thing that is and will be free!
Bear witness for me, wheresoe'er ye be,
With what deep worship I have still adored
The spirit of divinest Liberty.

II.

When France in wrath her giant-limbs uprear'd,
And with that oath, which smote air, earth
and sea,
Stamp'd her strong foot and said she would be free,

Bear witness for me, how I hoped and fear'd!
With what a joy my lofty gratulation
Unawed I sang, amid a slavish band:
And when to whelm the disenchanted nation,
Like fiends embattled by a wizard's wand,
The monarchs march'd in evil day,
And Britain join'd the dire array;
Though dear her shores and circling ocean,
Though many friendships, many youthful loves
Had sworn the patriot emotion,
And flung a magic light o'er all her hills and groves;
Yet still my voice, unalter'd sang defeat
To all that braved the tyrant-quelling lance,
And shame too long delay'd and vain retreat?
For ne'er, O Liberty! with partial aim
I dimm'd thy light or damp'd thy holy flame;
But bless'd the pæans of deliver'd France,
And hung my head and wept at Britain's name.

III.

"And what," I said, "though blasphemy's loud scream
With that sweet music of deliverance strove!
Though all the fierce and drunken passions wove,
A dance more wild than e'er was maniac's dream!
Ye storms, that round the dawning east assembled,
The sun was rising, though he hid his light!
And when, to soothe my soul, that hoped and trembled,
The dissonance ceased, and all seemed calm and
bright;
When France her front deep-scar'd and gory
Conceal'd with clustering wreaths of glory;
When insupportably advancing,
Her arm made mockery of the warrior's tramp;
While timid looks of fury glancing,
Domestic treason, crush'd beneath her fatal
stamp,
Writhed like a wounded dragon in his gore;
Then I reproach'd my fears that would not flee;

"And soon," I said, "shall Wisdom teach her
lore
In the low huts of them that toil and groan!
And, conquering by her happiness alone,
Shall France compel the nations to be free.
Till Love and Joy look round, and call the earth their own."

IV.

Forgive me, Freedom! O forgive those dreams!
I hear thy voice, I hear thy loud lament,
From bleak Helvetia's icy caverns sent—
I hear thy groans upon her blood-stain'd streams!
Heroes, that for your peaceful country pe-
rish'd;
And ye that, fleeing, spot your mountain-snows
With bleeding wounds; forgive me that I cherish'd
One thought that ever bless'd your cruel foes!
To scatter rage, and traitorous guilt,
Where peace her jealous home had built,
A patriot race to disinherit
Of all that made their stormy wilds so dear;
And with inexpiable spirit
To taint the bloodless freedom of the mountaineer—
O France, that mockest Heaven, adulterous, blind,
And patriot only in pernicious toils!
Are these thy boasts, Champion of human kind?
To mix with kings in the low lust of sway,
Yell in the hunt, and share the murderous
prey;
To insult the shrine of Liberty with spoils
From freemen torn; to tempt and to betray.

V.

The sensual and the dark rebel in vain,
Slaves by their own compulsion! In mad game
They burst their manacles and wear the name
Of freedom, graven on a heavier chain!
O Liberty! with profitless endeavour
Have I pursued thee, many a weary hour;
But thou nor swell'st the victors' strain, nor ever
Didst breathe thy soul in forms of human power.
Alike from all, howe'er they praise thee
(Not prayer, nor boastful name delays thee),
Alike from priestcraft's harpy minions,
And factious blasphemy's obscener slaves,
Thou speedest on thy subtle pinions,
The guide of homeless winds, and playmate of the waves!
And there I felt thee!—on that sea-cliff's verge,
Whose pines, scarce travell'd by the breeze
above,
Had made one murmur with the distant surge!
Yes, while I stood and gazed, my temples bare,
And shot my being through earth, sea and air,
Possessing all things with intensest love,
O Liberty! my spirit felt thee there.

LINES WRITTEN IN THE HARTZ FOREST.

I stood on Brocken's sovran height, and saw
Woods crowding upon woods, hills over hills,
A surging scene, and only limited
By the blue distance. Heavily my way
Downward I dragg'd through fir-groves evermore, [forms

Where bright green moss heaves in sepulchral
Speckled with sunshine; and, but seldom heard,
The sweet bird's song became a hollow sound;
And the breeze, murmuring indivisibly,
Preserved its solemn murmur most distinct
From many a note of many a waterfall,
And the brook's chatter; mid whose islet stones
The dingy kidling with its tinkling bell
Leap'd frolicsome, or old romantic goat
Sat, his white beard slow waving. I moved on
In low and languid mood; for I had found
That outward forms, the loftiest still receive
Their finer influence from the life within:
Fair ciphers else: fair, but of import vague
Or unconcerning, where the heart not finds
History or prophecy of friend, or child,
Or gentle maid, our first and early love,
Or father, or the venerable name
Of our adored country! O thou queen,
Thou delegated deity of earth,
O dear, dear England! how my longing eye
Turn'd westward, shaping in the steady clouds
Thy sands and high white cliffs!

My native land! [proud,
Fill'd with the thought of thee this heart was
Yea, mine eye swam with tears: that all the view
From sovran Brocken, woods, and woody hills,
Floated away, like a departing dream,
Feeble and dim! Stranger, these impulses
Blame thou not lightly; nor will I profane,
With hasty judgment or injurious doubt,
That man's sublimer spirit, who can feel
That God is every where: the God who framed
Mankind to be one mighty family
Himself our Father, and the world our home.

COMPLAINT AND REPROOF.

"How seldom, friend! a good great man inherits
Honour or wealth, with all his worth and pains!
It sounds like stories from the land of spirits,
If any man obtain that which he merits,
Or any merit that which he obtains."

For shame, dear friend! renounce this canting strain! [tain?
What wouldst thou have a good great man ob-
Place—titles—salary—a gilded chain—
Or thrones of corpses which his sword hath slain?—
Greatness and goodness are not means, but ends!
Hath he not always treasures, always friends,
The good great man?—three treasures, love
and light,
And calm thoughts, regular as infant's breath;—
And three firm friends, more sure than day and night—
Himself, his Maker, and the angel Death.

THE TREASURES OF THE DEEP.

WHAT hid'st thou in thy treasure-caves and cells?
Thou hollow-sounding and mysterious main!
—Pale glistening pearls, and rainbow-coloured shells,
Bright things which gleam unrecked-of, and in vain!
—Keep, keep thy riches, melancholy sea!
We ask not such from thee.

Yet more, the depths have more!—what wealth untold,
Far down, and shining through their stillness
lies!
Thou hast the starry gems, the burning gold,
Won from ten thousand royal Argosies!
—Sweep o'er thy spoils, thou wild and wrathful
main!
Earth claims not these again.

Yet more, the depths have more! thy waves have rolled
Above the cities of a world gone by!
Sand hath filled up the palaces of old,
Sea-weed o'ergrown the halls of revelry.
—Dash o'er them, ocean! in thy scornful play!
Man yields them to decay.

Yet more! the billows and the depths have more!
High hearts and brave are gathered to thy breast!
They hear not now the booming waters roar,
The battle-thunders will not break their rest.
—Keep thy red gold and gems, thou stormy grave!
Give back the true and brave!

Give back the lost and lovely!—those for whom
The place was kept at board and hearth so long,
The prayer went up through midnight's breathless gloom.
And the vain yearning woke 'midst festal song!
Hold fast thy buried isles, thy towers o'er-
thrown—
But all is not thine own.

To thee the love of woman hath gone down,
Dark flow thy tides o'er manhood's noble head,
O'er youth's bright locks, and beauty's flowery
crown,
—Yet must thou hear a voice—restore the dead!
Earth shall reclaim her precious things from
thee!
—Restore the dead, thou sea!

ENGLAND'S DEAD.

Son of the ocean isle !
Where sleep your mighty dead ?
Show me what high and stately pile
Is reared o'er Glory's bed.

Go, stranger ! track the deep,
Free, free, the white sail spread !
Wave may not foam, nor wild wind sweep,
Where rest not England's dead.

On Egypt's burning plains,
By the pyramid o'erswayed,
With fearful power the noon-day reigns,
And the palm-trees yield no shade.

But let the angry sun
From heaven look fiercely red,
Unfelt by those whose task is done !
There slumber England's dead.

The hurricane hath might
Along the Indian shore,
And far, by Ganges' banks at night,
Is heard the tiger's roar.

But let the sound roll on !
It hath no tone of dread
For those that from their toils are gone ;
—There slumber England's dead.

Loud rush the torrent-floods
The western wilds among,
And free, in green Columbia's woods,
The hunter's bow is strung.

But let the floods rush on !
Let the arrow's flight be sped !
Why should they reck whose task is done ?
There slumber England's dead !

The mountain-storms rise high
In the snowy Pyrenees,
And toss the pine boughs through the sky,
Like rose-leaves on the breeze.

But let the storm rage on !
Let the forest-wreaths be shed !
For the Roncesvalles' field is won,
There slumber England's dead.

On the frozen deep's repose
'Tis a dark and dreadful hour,
When round the ship the ice-fields close,
To chain her with their power.

But let the ice drift on !
Let the cold-blue desert spread !
Their course with mast and flag is done,
There slumber England's dead.

The warlike of the isles,
The men of field and wave !
Are not the rocks their funeral piles,
The seas and shores their grave ?

Go, stranger ! track the deep,
Free, free the white sail spread !
Wave may not foam, nor wild wind sweep,
Where rest not England's dead.

THE LANDING OF THE PILGRIM FATHERS.

The breaking waves dashed high
On a stern and rock-bound coast,
And the woods, against a stormy sky,
Their giant branches tost ;
And the heavy night hung dark
The hills and waters o'er,
When a band of exiles moored their bark
On the wild New England shore.

Not as the conqueror comes,
They, the true-hearted came,
Not with the roll of the stirring drums,
And the trumpet that sings of fame ;

Not as the flying come,
In silence and in fear,—
They shook the depths of the desert's gloom
With their hymns of lofty cheer.

Amidst the storm they sang,
And the stars heard and the sea !
And the sounding aisles of the dim woods rang
To the anthem of the free !

The ocean-eagle soared
From his nest by the white wave's foam,
And the rocking pines of the forest roared—
This was their welcome home !

There were men with hoary hair,
Amidst that pilgrim-band—
Why had they come to wither there
Away from their childhood's land ?

There was woman's fearless eye,
Lit by her deep love's truth ;
There was manhood's brow serenely high,
And the fiery heart of youth.

What sought they thus afar ?
Bright jewels of the mine ?
The wealth of seas, the spoils of war ?
—They sought a faith's pure shrine !

Ay, call it holy ground,
The soil where first they trod !
They have left unstained what there they found—
Freedom to worship God !

THE HOUR OF DEATH.

LEAVES have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north-wind's breath,
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, oh ! Death.

Day is for mortal care,
Eve for glad meetings round the joyous hearth,
Night for the dreams of sleep, the voice of prayer—
But all for thee, thou mightiest of the earth.

The banquet hath its hour,
Its feverish hour of mirth, and song, and wine ;
There comes a day for grief's o'erwhelm-
ing power,
A time for softer tears—but all are thine.

Youth and the opening rose
May look like things too glorious for decay,
And smile at thee—but thou art not of those
That wait the ripened bloom to seize their prey.

Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to wither at the north-wind's breath,
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, oh ! Death.

We know when moons shall wane,
When summer-birds from far shall cross the sea,
When autumn's hue shall tinge the golden grain—

But who shall teach us when to look for thee ?

Is it when Spring's first gale
Comes forth to whisper where the violets lie ?
Is it when roses in our paths grow pale ?—
They have one season—all are hours to die !

Thou art where billows foam,
Thou art where music melts upon the air ;
Thou art around us in our peaceful home,
And the world calls us forth—and thou art there.

Thou art where friend meets friend,
Beneath the shadow of the elm to rest—
Thou art where foe meets foe and trumpets
rend [crest.

The skies, and swords beat down the princely
Leaves have their time to fall,
And flowers to whither at the north-wind's breath,
And stars to set—but all,
Thou hast all seasons for thine own, oh ! Death.

THE PALM-TREE.

It waved not through an eastern sky,
Beside a fount of Araby ;
It was not fanned by southern breeze
In some green isle of Indian seas,
Nor did its graceful shadow sleep
O'er stream, of Afric, lone and deep.

But fair the exiled palm-tree grew
Midst foliage of no kindred hue ;
Through the laburnum's dropping gold
Rose the light shaft of orient mould,
And Europe's violets, faintly sweet,
Purpled the moss-beds at its feet.

Strange looked it there !—the willow streamed
Where silvery waters near it gleamed ;
The lime-bough lured the honey-bee
To murmur by the desert's tree,
And showers of snowy roses made
A lustre in its fan-like shade.

There came an eve of festal hours—
Rich music filled that garden's bowers ;
Lamps that from flowering branches hung,
On spark's of dew soft colours flung,
And bright forms glanced—a fairy show—
Under the blossoms to and fro.

But one, a lone one, midst the throng.
Seemed reckless of all dance or song :
He was a youth of dusky mein,
Whereon the Indian sun had been
Of crested brow, and long black hair—
A stranger, like the palm-tree there.

And slowly, sadly, moved his plumes,
Glittering athwart the leafy glooms :
He passed the pale green olives by,
Nor won the chestnut-flowers his eye ;
But when to that sole palm he came,
Then shot a rapture through his frame !

To him, to him, its rustling spoke
The silence of his soul it broke !
It whispered of his own bright isle,
That lit the ocean with a smile ;
Aye, to his ear that native tone
Had something of the sea-wave's moan !

His mother's cabin home, that lay
Where feathery cocoas fringed the bay ;
The dashing of his brethren's oar,
The conch-note heard along the shore ;—
All through his wakening bosom swept :
He clasped his country's tree and wept !

Oh ! scorn him not !—the strength, whereby
The patriot girds himself to die,
Th' unconquerable power, which fills
The freeman battling on his hills,
These have one fountain deep and clear—
The same whence gushed that child-like tear !

THE BETTER LAND.

" I hear thee speak of the better land,
Thou callest its children a happy band ;
Mother ! oh where is that radiant shore ?
Shall we not seek it, and weep no more ?
Is it where the flower of the orange blows,
And the fire-flies glance through the myrtle boughs ?"

—" Not there, not there, my child !"

" Is it where the feathery palm-trees rise,
And the date grows ripe under sunny skies ?
Or 'midst the green islands of glittering seas,
Where fragrant forests perfume the breeze,
And strange, bright birds, on their starry wings,
Bear the rich hues of all glorious things ?"

—" Not there, not there, my child !"

" Is it far way, in some region old,
Where the rivers wander o'er sands of gold ?—
Where the burning rays of the ruby shine,
And the diamond lights up the secret mine,
And the pearl gleams forth from the coral strand ?—

Is it there, sweet mother, the better land ?"

—" Not there, not there, my child !"

" Eye hath not seen it, my gentle boy !
Ear hath not heard its deep songs of joy ;
Dreams cannot picture a world so fair—
Sorrow and death may not enter there ;
Time doth not breathe on its fadeless bloom,
For beyond the clouds, and beyond the tomb,
—It is there, it is there, my child !"

PLEASURES OF MEMORY.

[Part the First.]

TWILIGHT's soft dews steal o'er the village green
 With magic tints to harmonize the scene.
 Still'd is the hum that thro' the hamlet broke,
 When round the ruins of their ancient oak
 The peasants flocked to hear the minstrel play,
 And games and carols clos'd the busy day.
 Her wheel at rest, the matron thrills no more
 With treasure'd tales, and legendary lore.
 All, all are fled ; nor mirth nor music flows
 To chase the dreams of innocent repose.
 All, all are fled ; yet still I linger here !
 What secret charms this silent spot endear ?

Mark yon old mansion frowning thro' the trees,
 Whose hollow turret woos the whistling breeze.
 That casement, arch'd with ivy's brownest shade,
 First to these eyes the light of heaven conveyed.
 The mouldering gateway strews the grass-grown court,

Once the calm scene of many a simple sport ;
 When nature pleas'd, for life itself was new,
 And the heart promis'd what the fancy drew.

See, thro' the fractur'd pediment reveal'd,
 Where moss inlays the rudely-sculptur'd shield,
 The martin's old, hereditary nest.
 Long may the ruin spare its hallow'd guest !

As jars the hinge, what sullen echoes call !
 Oh haste, unfold the hospitable hall !
 That hall, where once, in antiquated state,
 The chair of justice held the grave debate.

Now stain'd with dews, with cobwebs darkly hung,

Oft has its roof with peals of rapture rung,
 When round yon ample board, in due degree,
 We sweeten'd every meal with social glee.
 The heart's light laugh pursued the circling jest ;

And all was sunshine in each little breast.
 'Twas here we chas'd the slipper by the sound ;
 And turn'd the blindfold hero round and round.
 'Twas here, at eve, we form'd our fairy ring ;
 And fancy flutter'd on her wildest wing.
 Giants and genii chain'd each wondering ear ;
 And orphan-sorrows drew the ready tear.
 Oft with the babes we wander'd in the wood,
 Or view'd the forest-feats of Robin Hood :
 Oft, fancy-led, at midnight's fearful hour,
 With startling step we scal'd the lonely tower ;
 O'er infant innocence to hang and weep,
 Murder'd by ruffian hands, when smiling in its sleep.

Ye household deities ! whose guardian eye
 Mark'd each pure thought, ere register'd on high ;
 Still, still ye walk the consecrated ground,
 And breathe the soul of inspiration round.

As o'er the dusky furniture I bend,
 Each chair awakes the feelings of a friend.
 The storied arras, source of fond delight,
 With old achievement charms the wilder'd sight ;
 And still, with heraldry's rich hues impress'd,
 On the dim window glows the pictur'd crest.
 The screen unfolds its many-colour'd chart,
 The clock still points its moral to the heart.
 That faithful monitor 'twas heav'n to hear !
 When soft it spoke a promis'd pleasure near :
 And has its sober hand, its simple chime,
 Forgot to trace the feather'd feet of Time ?
 That massive beam, with curious carvings wrought, [thought ;
 Whence the caged linnet sooth'd my pensive
 Those muskets, cas'd with venerable rust ;
 Those once lov'd forms, still breathing thro'
 their dust,
 Still from the frame, in mould gigantic cast,
 Starting to life—all whisper of the past !

As thro' the garden's desert paths I rove,
 What fond illusions swarm in every grove !
 How oft, when purple evening ting'd the west,
 We watch'd the emmet to her grainy nest ;
 Welcom'd the wild-bee home on weary wing,
 Laden with sweets, the choicest of the spring !
 How oft inscrib'd with Friendship's votive rhyme,
 The bark now silver'd by the touch of Time ;
 Soar'd in the swing, half pleas'd and half afraid,
 Thro' sister elms that wav'd their summer-
 shade ;

Or strew'd with crumbs yon root-inwoven seat,
 To lure the redbreast from his lone retreat !

Childhood's lov'd group revisits every scene ;
 The tangled wood-walk, and the tufted green !
 Indulgent Memory wakes, and lo, they live !
 Cloth'd with far softer hues than light can give.
 Thou first, best friend that heav'n assigns below,
 To soothe and sweeten all the cares we know ;
 Whose glad suggestion stills each vain alarm,
 When nature fades, and life forgets to charm ;
 Thee would the Muse invoke ! To thee belong
 The sage's precept, and the poet's song.
 What soften'd views thy magic glass reveals,
 When o'er the landscape Time's meek twilight steals !

As when in ocean sinks the orb of day,
 Long on the wave reflected lustres play,
 Thy temper'd gleams of happiness resign'd,
 Glance on the darken'd mirror of the mind.

The school's lone porch, with reverend mosaic
 gray,
 Just tells the pensive pilgrim where it lay.
 Mute is the bell that rung at peep of dawn,
 Quickening my truant-feet across the lawn :

Unheard the shout that rent the noontide air,
When the slow dial gave a pause to care.
Up springs, at every step, to claim a tear,
Some little friendship form'd and cherish'd here !
And not the lightest leaf, but trembling teems
With golden visions, and romantic dreams !

Down by yon hazel copse, at evening, blaz'd
The gipsy's faggot—there we stood and gaz'd ;
Gaz'd on her sun-burnt face with silent awe,
Her tatter'd mantle, and her hood of straw ;
Her moving lips, her caldron brimming o'er ;
The drowsy brood that on her back she bore,
Imps, in the barn with mousing owlet bred,
From rifled roost at nightly revel fed ;
Whose dark eyes flash'd thro' locks of blackest
shade,

When in the breeze the distant watch-dog bay'd :—
And heroes fled the Sibyl's mutter'd call,
Whose elfin prowess scal'd the orchard-wall.
As o'er my palm the silver piece she drew,
And trac'd the line of life with searching view,
How throbb'd my fluttering pulse with hopes and fears,

To learn the colour of my future years !
Ah, then, what honest triumph flush'd my breast !
This truth once known—'Tis bless is to be blest !
We led the bending beggar on his way,
(Bare were his feet, his tresses silver-gray)
Sooth'd the keen pang his aged spirit felt,
And on his tale with mute attention dwelt.
As in his scrip we dropt our little store,
And wept to think that little was no more,
He breath'd his prayer, " Long may such goodness live !"

'Twas all he gave, 'twas all he had to give.
Angels, when mercy's mandate wing'd their flight,
Had stopt to catch new rapture from the sight.

But hark ! thro' those old firs, with sullen swell
The church clock strikes ! ye tender scenes, farewell !

It calls me hence, beneath their shade, to trace
The few fond lines that time may soon efface.

On yon grey stone, that fronts the chancel-door,
Worn smooth by busy feet now seen no more,
Each eve we shot the marble thro' the ring,
When the heart danc'd and life was in its spring ;
Alas ! unconscious of the kindred earth,
That faintly echoed to the voice of mirth.

The glow-worm loves her emerald light to shed,
Where now the sexton rests his hoary head.
Oft, as he turned the greensward with his spade,
He lectur'd every youth that round him play'd ;
And, calmly pointing where his fathers lay,
Rous'd him to rival each, the hero of his day.

Hush, ye fond flutterings, hush ! while here alone
I search the records of each mouldering stone.
Guides of my life ! Instructors of my youth !
Who first unveil'd the hallow'd form of truth ;

Whose every word enlighten'd and endear'd ;
In age belov'd, in poverty rever'd ;
In friendship's silent register ye live,
Nor ask the vain memorial art can give.

—But when the sons of peace and pleasure sleep,
When only sorrow wakes, and wakes to weep,
What spells entrance my visionary mind,
With sigh so sweet, with transports so refin'd ?

Ethereal power ! whose smile, at noon of night,
Recalls the far-flied spirit of delight ;
Instils that musing, melancholy mood,
Which charms the wise, and elevates the good ;
Blest memory, hail ! Oh grant the grateful muse,

Her pencil dipt in nature's living hues,
To pass the clouds that round thy empire roll,
And trace its airy precincts in the soul.

Lull'd in the countless chambers of the brain,
Our thoughts are link'd by many a hidden chain.

Awake but one, and lo, what myriads rise !
Each stamps its image as the other flies !
Each, as the various avenues of sense
Delight or sorrow to the soul dispense,
Brightens or fades ; yet all, with magic art,
Control the latent fibres of the heart.
As studious Prospero's mysterious spell
Conven'd the subject-spirits to his cell ;
Each, at thy call, advances or retires,
As judgment dictates, or the scene inspires.
Each shrills the seat of sense, that sacred source,
Whence the fine nerves direct their mazy course,
And thro' the frame invisibly convey
The subtle quick vibrations as they play.

Survey the globe, each ruder realm explore ;
From reason's faintest ray to Newton soar :
What different spheres to human bliss assign'd !
What slow gradations in the scale of mind !
Yet mark in each these mystic wonders wrought ;
Oh mark the sleepless energies of thought !

The adventurous boy, that asks his little share,
And hies from home, with many a gossip's prayer,
Turns on the neighbouring hill, once more to see
The dear abode of peace and privacy ;
And as he turns, the thatch among the trees,
The smoke's blue wreaths ascending with the breeze,
The village common spotted white with sheep,
The church-yard yews round which his fathers
sleep ;
All rouse reflection's sadly-pleasing train,
And oft he looks and weeps, and looks again.

So, when the mild Tupia dar'd explore
Arts yet untaught, and worlds unknown before,
And, with the sons of science, woo'd the gale,
That, rising, swell'd their strange expanse of sail ;
So, when he breath'd his firm yet fond adieu,
Borne from his leafy hut, his carved canoe,

And all his soul best-lov'd—such tears he shed,
While each soft scene of summer-beauty fled.
Long o'er the wave a wistful look he cast,
Long watch'd the streaming signal from the mast;

Till twilight's dewy tints deceiv'd his eye,
And fairy forest fring'd the evening sky.

So, Scotia's queen, as slowly dawn'd the day,
Rose on her couch, and gaz'd her soul away.
Her eyes had bless'd the beacon's glimmering height.

That faintly tipt the feathery surge with light;
But now the morn with orient hues pourtray'd
Each castled cliff, and brown monastic shade:
All touched the talisman's resistless spring,
And lo, what busy tribes were instant on the wing!

Thus kindred objects kindred thoughts inspire,
As summer clouds flash forth electric fire.
And hence this spot gives back the joys of youth,

Warm as the life, and with the mirror's truth.
Hence home-felt pleasure prompts the patriot's
sigh;

This makes him wish to live, and dare to die.
For this young Foscari, whose hapless fate
Venice should blush to hear the muse relate,
When exile wore his blooming years away,
'To sorrow's long soliloquies a prey,
When reason, justice, vainly urg'd his cause,
For this he rous'd her sanguinary laws;
Glad to return, tho' hope could grant no more,
And chains and torture hail'd him to the shore.

And hence the charm historic scenes impart:
Hence I'ber awes, and Avon melts the heart.
Aërial forms, in 'Tempe's classic vale,
Glance thro' the gloom, and whisper in the gale;

In wild Vaucluse with love and Laura dwell,
And watch and weep in Eloisa's cell.
'Twas ever thus. As now at Virgil's tomb,
We bless the shade, and bid the verdure bloom:
So Tully paus'd amid the wrecks of time,
On the rude stone to trace the truth sublime;
When at his feet, in honour'd dust disclos'd,
The immortal sage of Syracuse repos'd.
And as his youth in sweet delusion hung,
Where once a Plato taught, a Pindar sung;
Who now but meets him musing, when he roves
His ruin'd Tusculum's romantic groves?
In Rome's great forum, who but hears him roll
His moral thunders o'er the subject soul?

And hence that calm delight the portrait gives:
We gaze on every feature till it lives!
Still the fond lover views the absent maid;
And the lost friend still lingers in his shade!
Say why the pensive widow loves to weep,
When on her knee she rocks her babe to sleep:
Tremblingly still, she lifts his veil to trace
The father's features in his infant face!

The hoary grandsire smiles the hour-away,
Won by the charm of innocence at play;
He bends to meet each artless burst of joy,
Forgets his age, and acts again the boy.

What tho' the iron school of war erase
Each milder virtue, and each softer grace:
What tho' the fiend's torpedo-touch arrest
Each gentler, finer impulse of the breast;
Still shall this active principle preside,
And wake the tear, to pity's self denied.

The intrepid Swiss, that guards a foreign shore,
Condemn'd to climb his mountain-cliffs no more,
If chance he hear the song so sweetly wild
Which on those cliffs his infant hours beguill'd,
Melts at the long-lost scenes that round him
rise,

And sinks a martyr to repentant sighs,
Ask not if courts or camps dissolve the charm:
Say why Vespasian lov'd his Sabine farm;
Why great Navarre, when France and freedom
bled,

Sought the lone limits of a forest-shed.
When Diocletian's self-corrected mind
The imperial fasces of a world resign'd,
Say why we trace the labours of his spade,
In calm Salona's philosophic shade.
Say, when contentious Charles renounc'd a throne,
To muse with monks unletter'd and unknown,
What from his soul the parting tribute drew?
What claim'd the sorrows of a last adieu?

The still retreats that sooth'd his tranquil breast,
Ere grandeur dazzled, and its cares oppress'd.
Undamp'd by time, the generous instinct glows
Far as Angola's sands, as Zembla's snows;
Glow in the tiger's den, the serpent's nest,
On every form of varied life impress.

The social tribes its choicest influence hail:—
And, when the drum beats briskly in the gale,
The war-worn courser charges at the sound,
And with young vigour wheels the pasture round.

Oft has the aged tenant of the vale
Lean'd on his staff to lengthen out the tale;
Oft have his lips the grateful tribute breath'd,
From sire to son with pious zeal bequeath'd.
When o'er the blasted heath the day declin'd,
And on the scath'd oak warr'd the winter-wind;
When not a distant taper's twinkling ray
Gleam'd o'er the furze to light him on his way;
When not a sheep-bell sooth'd his listening ear,
And the big rain-drops told the tempest near;
Then did his horse the homeward track descry,
The track that shunn'd his sad, inquiring eye;
And win each wavering purpose to relent,
With warmth so mild, so gently violent,
That his charm'd hand the careless rein resign'd
And doubts and terrors vanish'd from his mind.
Recall the traveller, whose alter'd form
Has borne the buffet of the mountain-storm;
And who will first his fond impatience meet?
His faithful dog's already at his feet!

Yes, tho' the porter spurn him from the door,
 Tho' all, that knew him, know his face no more,
 His faithful dog shall tell his joy to each,
 With that mute eloquence which passes speech.—
 And see, the master but returns to die!
 Yet who shall bid the watchful servant fly?
 The blasts of heav'n, the drenching dews of earth,
 The wanton insults of unfeeling mirth,
 These, when to guard misfortune's sacred grave,
 Will firm fidelity exult to brave.

Led by what chart, transports the timid dove
 The wreaths of conquest, or the vows of love?
 Say, thro' the clouds what compass points her flight?

Monarchs have gaz'd, and nations bless'd the sight.

Pile rocks on rocks, bid woods and mountains rise,
 Eclipse her native shades, her native skies;—
 'Tis vain! thro' Ether's pathless wilds she goes,
 And lights at last where all her cares repose.

Sweet bird! thy truth shall Harlem's walls attest,
 And unborn ages consecrate thy nest.
 When, with the silent energy of grief,
 With looks that ask'd, yet dar'd not hope relief,
 Want, with her babes, round generous valour
 clung,

To wring the slow surrender from his tongue,
 'Twas thine to animate her closing eye;
 Alas! 'twas thine perchance the first to die,
 Crush'd by her meagre hand, when welcom'd from the sky.

Hark! the bee winds her small but mellow horn,
 Bliſſe to salute the sunny smile of morn.
 O'er thymy downs she bends her busy course,
 And many a stream allures her to its source.
 'Tis noon, 'tis night. That eye so finely wrought,
 Beyond the search of sense, the soar of thought,
 Now vainly asks the scenes she left behind;
 Its orb so full, its vision so confin'd!
 Who guides the patient pilgrim to her cell?
 Who bids her soul with conscious triumph swell?
 With conscious truth retrace the mazy clue
 Of varied scents, that charm'd her as she flew?
 Hail, memory, hail! thy universal reign
 Guards the least link of Being's glorious chain.

Conclusion of the Poem.

[From Part the Second.]

HAIL, Memory, hail! in thy exhaustless mine
 From age to age unnumbered treasures shine!
 Thought and her shadowy brood thy call obey,
 And place and time are subject to thy sway!
 Thy pleasures most we feel when most alone;
 The only pleasures we can call our own.
 Lighter than air, hope's summer visions die,
 If but a fleeting cloud obscure the sky;
 If but a beam of sober reason play,
 Lo, Fancy's fairy frost-work melts away!

422

But can the wiles of art, the grasp of power,
 Snatch the rich relics of a well-spent hour?
 These when the trembling spirit wings her flight,
 Pour round her path a stream of living light;
 And gild those pure and perfect realms of rest
 Where virtue triumphs and her sons are blest!

AT DOVER CLIFFS.

On these white cliffs that calm above the flood
 Uplift their shadowy heads, and at their feet
 Scarce hear the surge that has for ages beat,
 Sure many a lonely wanderer has stood:

And while the lifted murmur met his ear
 And o'er the distant billows the still eve
 Sail'd slow, has thought of all his heart must leave
 To-morrow;—of the friends he lov'd most dear:

Of social scenes from which he wept to part.—
 But if like me, he knew how fruitless all
 The thoughts that would full fain the past recall,
 Soon would he quell the risings of his heart,
 And brave the wild winds and unhearing tide:—
 The world his country, and his God his guide.

AT A CONVENT.

If chance some pensive stranger hither led,
 His bosom glowing from majestic views
 The gorgeous dome or the proud landscape's hues,
 Should ask who sleeps beneath this lowly bed—
 'Tis poor MATILDA—to the cloister'd scene
 A mourner, beauteous and unknown, she came To shed her tears unmarkt, and quench the flame
 Of fruitless love.—Yet was her look serene
 As the pale moon-light in the midnight aisle:
 Her voice was soft; which yet a charm could lend
 Like that which spoke of a departed Friend;—
 And a meek sadness sat upon her smile!—
 Now far remov'd from every earthly ill
 Her woes are buried, and her heart is still.

AT OSTEND.

How sweet the tuneful bells responsive peal!
 As when at opening morn the fragrant breeze
 Breathes on the trembling sense of wan disease;
 So piercing to my heart their force I feel.

And hark, with lessening cadence now they fall !
 And now along the white and level tide
 They fling their melancholy music wide
 Bidding me many a tender thought recall

Of summer-days, and those delightful years
 When by my native streams, in life's fair
 prime,
 The mournful Magic of their mingling chime
 First wak'd my wandering childhood into tears :
 But seeming now, when all those days are o'er,
 The sounds of joy once heard and heard no
 more.

TIME.

O TIME ! who knowest a lenient hand to lay
 Softest on sorrow's wound, and slowly thence (Lulling to sad repose the weary sense)
 The faint pang stealest unperceived away ;
 On thee I rest my only hope at last
 And think when thou hast dried the bitter tear
 That flows in vain o'er all my soul held dear,
 I may look back on every sorrow past,
 And meet life's peaceful evening with a smile—
 As some lone bird, at day's departing hour,
 Sings in the sunbeam, of the transient shower
 Forgetful, though its wings are wet the while :—
 Yet ah ! how much must that poor heart endure
 Which hopes from thee, and thee alone, a cure !

JOANNA BAILLIE.

Born 1764.

LORD JOHN OF THE EAST.

THE fires blazed bright till deep midnight,
 And the guests sat in the hall,
 And the Lord of the feast, lord John of the East,
 Was the merriest of them all.

His dark-grey eye, that wont so sly
 Beneath his helm to scowl,
 Flash'd keenly bright, like a new-waked sprite,
 As pass'd the circling bowl.

In laughter light, or jocund lay,
 That voice was heard, whose sound,
 Stern, loud, and deep, in battle-fray
 Did foemen fierce astound ;

And stretch'd so calm, like lady's palm,
 To every jester pear,
 That hand which through a prostrate foe
 Oft thrust the ruthless spear.

The gallants sang, and the goblets rang,
 And they revell'd in careless state,
 Till a thundering sound, that shook the ground,
 Was heard at the castle-gate.

" Who knocks without, so loud and stout ?
 Some wandering knight, I ween,
 Who from afar, like a guiding star,
 Our blazing hall hath seen.

" If a stranger it be of high degree,
 (No churl durst make such a din,)
 Step forth amain, my pages twain,
 And soothly ask him in.

" Tell him our cheer is the forest deer,
 Our bowl is mantling high,
 And the lord of the feast is John of the East,
 Who welcomes him courteously."

The pages twain return'd again,
 And a wild scared look had they :
 " Why look ye so ?—is it friend or foe ?"
 Did the angry baron say.

" A stately knight without doth wait,
 But further he will not hie,
 Till the baron himself shall come to the gate,
 And ask him courteously."

" By my mother's shroud, he is full proud !
 What earthly man is he ?" [youth,
 " I know not in truth," quoth the trembling
 " If earthly man it be.

" In traveller's plight he is bedight,
 With a vest of the crim'sy meet ; [wind,
 But his mantle behind, that streams on the
 Is a corse's bloody sheet."

" Out, paltry child ! thy wits are wild,
 Thy comrade will me true :
 Say plainly, then, what hast thou seen ?
 Or dearly shalt thou rue."

Faint spoke the second page with fear,
 And bent him on his knee,
 " Were I on your father's sword to swear,
 The same it appear'd to me."

Then dark, dark lower'd the baron's eye,
 And his red cheek changed to wan ;
 For again at the gate more furiously
 The thundering din began.

" And is there ne'er of my vassals here,
 Of high or low degree,
 That will unto this stranger go—
 Will go for the love of me ?"

Then spoke and said fierce Donald the Red—
 (A fearless man was he),
 " Yes ; I will straight to the castle-gate,
 Lord John, for the love of thee."

With heart full stout he hied him out,
While silent all remain ;
Nor moved a tongue those gallants among,
Till Donald return'd again.

" O speak," said his Lord ; " by thy hopes of grace,
What stranger must we hail ?"
But the haggard look of Donald's face
Made his faltering words to fail.

" It is a knight in some foreign guise—
His like I did never behold ;
For the stony look of his beamless eyes
Made my very life-blood cold.

" I did him greet in fashion meet,
And bade him your feast partake ;
But the voice that spoke, when he silence broke,
Made the earth beneath me quake.

" O such a tone did tongue ne'er own
That dwelt in mortal head ;
It is like a sound from the hollow ground—
Like the voice of the coffin'd dead.

" I bade him to your social board ;
But in he will not hie,
Until at the gate this castle's lord
Shall entreat him courteously.

" And he stretch'd him the while, with a ghastly smile,
And sternly bade me say,
'Twas no depute's task your guest to ask
To the feast of the woody bay."

Pale grew the baron, and faintly said,
As he heaved his breath with pain—
" From such a feast as there was spread,
Do any return again ?

" I bade my guest to a bloody feast,
Where the death'a-wound was his fare ;
And the isle's bright maid, who my love betray'd,
She tore her raven hair.

" The sea-fowl screams, and the watch-tower
gleams,
And the deafening billows roar,
Where the unblest was put to rest
On a wild and distant shore.

" Do the hollow grave and the whelming wave
Give up their dead again ?
Doth the surgy waste waft o'er its breast
The spirits of the slain ?"

But his loosen'd limbs shook fast, and pour'd
The big drops from his brow,
As louder still the third time roar'd
The thundering gate below.

" O rouse thee, baron, for manhood's worth !
Let good or ill befall,
Thou must to the stranger knight go forth,
And ask him to your hall."

" Rouse thy bold breast," said each eager guest ;
" What boots it shrinking so ?
Be it fiend or sprite, or murder'd knight,
In God's name thou must go.

" Why should'st thou fear ? dost thou not wear
A gift from the great Glendower—
Sandals blest by a holy priest,
O'er which nought ill hath power ?"

All ghastly pale, did the baron quail,
As he turn'd him to the door,
And his sandals blest by a holy priest,
Sound feebly on the floor.

Then back to the hall, and his merry mates all,
He cast his parting eye :
" God send thee amain safe back again !"
He heaved a heavy sigh.

Then listen'd they, on the lengthen'd way,
To his faint and lessening tread ;
And, when that was past, to the wailing blast,
That wail'd as for the dead.

But wilder it grew, and stronger it blew,
And it rose with an elrich sound,
Till the lofty keep on its rocky steep
Fell hurtling to the ground.

Each fearful eye then glanced on high,
To the lofty-window'd wall ;
When a fiery trace of the baron's face
Through the casements shone on all.

But the vision'd glare pass'd through the air,
And the raging tempest ceased :
And never more, on sea or shore,
Was seen Lord John of the East.

The sandals blest by a holy priest,
Lay unscathed on the swarded green ;
But never again, on land or main,
Lord John of the East was seen.

SONG.

From the Beacon.

I.

Wish'd-for gales the light vane weering,
Better dreams the dull night cheering ;
Lighter heart the morning greeting,
Things of better omen meeting ;
Eyes each passing stranger watching,
Ears each feeble rumour catching,
Say he existeth still on earthly ground,
The absent will return, the long, long lost be found.

II.

In the tower the ward-bell ringing,
In the court the carols singing,
Busy hands the gay board dressing,
Eager steps the threshold pressing;
Open'd arms in haste advancing,
Joyful looks through blind tears glancing;
The gladsome bounding of his aged hound,
Say he in truth is here, our long, long lost is found.

III.

Hymned thanks and bedesmen praying,
With sheathed sword the urchin playing;
Blazon'd hall with torches burning,
Cheerful morn in peace returning,
Converse sweet that strangely borrows
Present bliss from former sorrows—
O, who can tell each blessed sight and sound,
That says, he with us bides, our long, long lost is found!

FIRST VIEW OF AMERICA.

[From "Columbus" a National Legend.]

It was a land, unmarred by art,
To please the eye and cheer the heart:
The native's simple huts were seen
Peeping their palmy groves between,— Groves, where each dome of sweepy leaves
In air of morning gently heaves,
And, as the deep vans fall and rise,
Changes its richly verdant dyes;
A land whose simple sons till now
Had scarcely seen a careful brow;
They spent at will each passing day
In lightsome toil or active play.
Some their light canoes were guiding,
Along the shore's sweet margin gliding;
Some in the sunny sea were swimming.
The bright waves o'er their dark forms gleaming;
Some on the beach for shellfish stooping,
Or on the smooth sand gaily trooping;
Or in link'd circles featly dancing
With golden braid and bracelet glancing.—
By shelter'd door were infants creeping,
Or on the shaded herbage sleeping;
Gay feather'd birds the air were winging,
And parrots on their high perch swinging,
While humming birds, like sparks of light,
Twinkled and vanish'd from the sight.

FAME.

(From the same Poem.)

O! who shall lightly say that fame,
Is nothing but an empty name!
Whilst in that sound there is a charm
The nerve to brace, the heart to warm,
As thinking of the mighty dead,
The young from slothful couch will start,
And vow, with lifted hands outspread,
Like them to act a noble part?

O! who shall lightly say that fame
Is nothing but an empty name!
When, but for those, our mighty dead,
All ages past, a blank would be,
Sunk in oblivion's murky bed,—
A desert bare, a shipless sea?
They are the distant objects seen,—
The lofty marks of what hath been.

O! who shall lightly say that fame
Is nothing but an empty name!
When memory of the mighty dead
To earthborn pilgrim's wistful eye
The brightest rays of cheering shed,
That point to immortality?

A twinkling speck, but fixed and bright,
To guide us through the dreary night,
Each hero shines, and lures the soul
To gain the distant happy goal,
For is there one who musing o'er the grave
Where lies interred the good the wise, the brave,
Can poorly think, beneath the mouldering heap,
That noble being shall for ever sleep?
"No," saith the generous heart, and fondly swells.
"Though his sere'd corse lies here, with God his spirit dwells."

LAODAMIA.

"WITH sacrifice before the rising morn
Vows have I made by fruitless hope inspired;
And from the infernal gods, mid shades forlorn
Of night, my slaughtered lord have I required:
Celestial pity I again implore;—
Restore him to my sight—great Jove restore!"

So speaking; and by fervent love endowed
With faith, the suppliant heavenward lifts her hands;
While, like the sun emerging from a cloud,
Her countenance brightens—and her eye expands;
Her bosom heaves and spreads, her stature grows
And she expects the issue in repose.

O terror! what hath she perceived?—O joy!
What doth she look on?—whom doth she behold?
Her hero slain upon the beach of Troy?
His vital presence—his corporeal mould?
It is—if sense deceive her not—'tis he!
And a god leads him—winged Mercury!

Mild Hermes spake—and touched her with his wand
That calms all fear, "Such grace hath crowned thy prayer,
Laodamia! that at Jove's command
Thy husband walks the paths of upper air:
He comes to tarry with thee three hours' space;
Accept the gift, behold him face to face!"

Forth sprang the impassioned queen her lord
to clasp;
Again that consummation she essayed;
But unsubstantial form eludes her grasp
As often as that eager grasp was made.
The phantom parts—but parts to re-unite,
And re-assume his place before her sight.

"Protesilaus, lo! thy guide is gone!
Confirm, I pray, the vision with thy voice:
This is our Palace,—yonder is thy throne;
Speak, and the floor thou tread'st on will rejoice.

Not to appal me have the gods bestowed
This precious boon,—and blest a sad abode."

"Great Jove, Laodamia! doth not leave
His gifts imperfect:—Spectre though I be,
I am not sent to scare thee or deceive;
But in reward of thy fidelity.
And something also did my worth obtain;
For fearless virtue bringeth boundless gain.

"Thou knowest, the Delphic oracle foretold
That the first Greek who touched the Trojan strand [hold;
Should die; but me the threat could not with-
A generous cause a victim did demand;
And forth I leapt upon the sandy plain;
A self-devoted chief—by Hector slain."

"Supreme of heroes—bravest, noblest, best!
Thy matchless courage I bewail no more,
Which then, when tens of thousands were deprest

By doubt, propelled thee to the fatal shore;
Thou found'st—and I forgive thee—here thou art—
A nobler counsellor than my poor heart.

"But thou, though capable of sternest deed,
Wert kind as resolute, and good as brave;
And he, whose power restores thee, hath decreed [grave;
That thou should'st cheat the malice of the Redundant are thy locks, thy lips as fair
As when their breath enriched Thessalian air.

"No spectre greets me—no vain shadow this;
Come, blooming hero, place thee by my side!
Give, on this well known couch, one nuptial kiss
To me, this day, a second time thy bride!"
Jove frowned in heaven: the conscious Parcae threw
Upon those roseate lips a Stygian hue.

"This visage tells thee that my doom is past:
Know, virtue were not virtue if the joys
Of sense were able to return as fast
And surely as they vanish.—Earth destroys
Those raptures duly—Erebus disdains:
Calm pleasures there abide—majestic pains.

"Be taught, O faithful consort, to control
Rebellious passion: for the gods approve
The depth, and not the tumult, of the soul;
A fervent, not ungovernable love.
Thy transports moderate; and meekly mourn;
When I depart, for brief is my sojourn—"

"Ah, wherefore?—Did not Hercules by force
Wrest from the guardian monster of the tomb
Alcestitis, a re-animated corse,
Given back to dwell on earth in vernal bloom?
Medea's spells dispersed the weight of years,
And Æson stood a youth 'mid youthful peers.

"The gods to us are merciful—and they
Yet further may relent: for mightier far
Than strength of nerve and sinew, or the sway
Of magic potent over sun and star,
Is love, though oft to agony distrest,
And though his favourite seat be feeble woman's breast.

"But if thou goest, I follow—" "Peace!" he said— [ed;
She looked upon him and was calmed and cheer-
The ghastly colour from his lips had fled;
In his deportment, shape, and mien, appeared
Elysian beauty, melancholy grace,
Brought from a pensive though a happy place.

He spake of love, such love as spirits feel
In worlds whose course is equable and pure;
No fears to beat away—no strife to heal—
The past unsighed for, and the future sure;
Spake of heroic arts in graver mood
Revived, with finer harmony pursued;

Of all that is most beautiful—imaged there
In happier beauty; more pellucid streams,
An ampler ether, a diviner air,
And fields invested with purpureal gleams;
Climes which the sun, who sheds the brightest
day
Earth knows, is all unworthy to survey.

Yet there the soul shall enter which hath earned
That privilege by virtue.—"Ill," said he,
"The end of man's existence I discerned,
Who from ignoble games and revelry
Could draw, when we had parted, vain delight
While tears were thy best pastime—day and
night:

And while my youthful peers, before my eyes
(Each hero following his peculiar bent)
Prepared themselves for glorious enterprise
By martial sports,—or, seated in the tent,

Chieftains and kings in council were detained ;
What time the fleet at Aulis lay enchained.

The wished-for wind was given :—I then revolved

The oracle, upon the silent sea ;
And, if no worthier led the way, resolved
That, of a thousand vessels, mine should be
The foremost prow in pressing to the strand,—
Mine the first blood that tinged the Trojan sand.

Yet bitter, oft-times bitter, was the pang
When of thy loss I thought, beloved wife !
On thee too fondly did my memory hang,
And on the joys we shared in mortal life,—
The paths which we had trod—these fountains—
flowers ;
My new-planned cities, and unfinished towers.

But should suspense permit the foe to cry,
' Behold they tremble ! haughty their array,
Yet of their number no one dares to die ?'
In soul I swept the indignity away :
Old frailties then recurred :—but lofty thought,
In act embodied, my deliverance wrought.

And thou, though strong in love, art all too weak

In reason, in self-government too slow ;
I counsel thee by fortitude to seek
Our blest re-union in the shades below.
The invisible world with thee hath sympathised ;
Be thy affections raised and solemnized.

Learn by a mortal yearning to ascend
Towards a higher object.—Love was given,
Encouraged, sanctioned, chiefly for that end ;
For this the passion to excess was driven—
That self might be annulled ; her bondage prove
The fetters of a dream, opposed to love."

Aloud she shrieked ! for Hermes re-appears !
Round the dear shade she would have clung—
'tis vain :

The hours are past—too brief had they been
years ;

And him no mortal effort can detain :
Swift, toward the realms that know not earthly
day

He through the portal takes his silent way,
And on the palace floor a lifeless corse she lay.

By no weak pity might the gods be moved ;
She who thus perished, not without the crime
Of lovers that in reason's spite have loved,
Was doomed to wear out her appointed time,
Apart from happy ghosts—that gather flowers
Of blissful quiet 'mid unfading bowers.

Yet tears to human suffering are due :
And mortal hopes defeated and o'erthrown
Are mourned by man, and not by man alone,
As fondly he believes.—Upon the side
Of Hellespont (such faith was entertained)

A knot of spiry trees for ages grew
From out the tomb of him for whom she died ;
And ever, when such stature they had gained
That Ilium's walls were subject to their view,
The trees' tall summits withered at the sight :
A constant interchange of growth and blight !

HART-LEAP WELL.

Hart-Leap Well is a small spring of water, about five miles from Richmond in Yorkshire and near the side of the road that leads from Richmond to Askrigg. Its name is derived from a remarkable Chase, the memory of which is preserved by the monuments spoken of in the second Part of the following Poem, which monuments do now exist as I have there described them.

THE knight had ridden down from Wensley
Moor

With the slow motion of a summer's cloud ;
He turned aside towards a vassal's door,
And " bring another horse !" he cried aloud.

" Another horse !"—That shout the vassal
heard

And saddled his best steed, a comely gray ;
Sir Walter mounted him ; he was the third
Which he had mounted on that glorious day.

Joy sparkled in the prancing courser's eyes ;
The horse and horseman are a happy pair ;
But, though Sir Walter like a falcon flies,
There is a doleful silence in the air.

A rout this morning left Sir Walter's hall,
That as they galloped made the echoes roar ;
But horse and man are vanished, one and all ;
Such race, I think, was never seen before.

Sir Walter, restless as a veering wind,
Calls to the few tired dogs that yet remain :
Blanch, Swift, and Music, noblest of their kind,
Follow, and up the weary mountain strain.

The knight hallooed, he cheered and chid them
on

With suppliant gestures and upbraidings stern ;
But breath and eyesight fail ; and, one by one,
The dogs are stretched among the mountain fern.

Where is the throng, the tumult of the race ?
The bugles that so joyfully were blown ?
—'Tis chase it looks not like an earthly chase ;
Sir Walter and the Hart are left alone.

The poor Hart toils along the mountain side ;
I will not stop to tell how far he fled,
Nor will I mention by what death he died ;
But now the knight beholds him lying dead.

Dismounting, then, he leaned against a thorn ;
He had no follower, dog, nor man, nor boy :
He neither cracked his whip, nor blew his horn,
But gazed upon the spoil with silent joy.

Close to the thorn on which Sir Walter leaned,
 Stood his dumb partner in this glorious feat ;
 Weak as a lamb the hour that it is yeaned ;
 And white with foam as if with cleaving sleet.

Upon his side the hart was lying stretched :
 His nostril touched a spring beneath a hill,
 And with the last deep groan his breath had fetched
 The waters of the spring were trembling still.

And now, too happy for repose or rest,
 (Never had living man such joyful lot !)
 Sir Walter walked all round, north, south, and west,
 And gazed and gazed upon that darling spot.

And climbing up the hill—(it was at least Nine roods of sheer ascent) Sir Walter found
 Three several hoof-marks which the hunted beast
 Had left imprinted on the grassy ground.

Sir Walter wiped his face, and cried, " Till
 now
 Such sight was never seen by living eyes :
 Three leaps have borne him from this lofty brow,
 Down to the very fountain where he lies.

I'll build a pleasure-house upon this spot,
 And a small harbour, made for rural joy ;
 'Twill be the traveller's shed, the pilgrim's cot,
 A place of love for damsels that are coy.

A cunning artist will I have to frame
 A basin for that fountain in the dell !
 And they who do make mention of the same,
 From this day forth, shall call it HART-LEAP
 WELL.

And, gallant stag ! to make thy praises known,
 Another monument shall here be raised ;
 Three several pillars, each a rough-hewn stone,
 And planted where thy hoofs the turf have grazed.

And, in the summer-time when days are long,
 I will come hither with my paramour ;
 And with the dancers and the minstrel's song
 We will make merry in that pleasant bower.

Till the foundations of the mountains fail
 My mansion with its harbour shall endure ;—
 The joy of them who till the fields of Swale,
 And them who dwell among the woods of Ure !"

Then home he went, and left the hart, stone-
 dead
 With breathless nostrils stretched above the spring.

—Soon did the knight perform what he had said
 And far and wide the fame thereof did ring.

4 s

Ere thrice the moon into her port had steered,
 A cup of stone received the living well ;
 Three pillars of rude stone Sir Walter reared,
 And built a house of pleasure in the dell.

And near the fountain, flowers of stature tall
 With trailing plants and trees were intertwined,—
 Which soon composed a little sylvan hall,
 A leafy shelter from the sun and wind.

And thither, when the summer-days were long,
 Sir Walter led his wondering paramour ;
 And with the dancers and the minstrel's song
 Made merriment within that pleasant bower.

The knight, Sir Walter, died in course of time
 And his bones lie in his paternal vale.—
 But there is matter for a second rhyme,
 And I to this would add another tale.

[Part Second.]

THE moving accident is not my trade :
 To freeze the blood I have no ready arts :
 'Tis my delight, alone in summer shade,
 To pipe a simple song for thinking hearts.

As I from Hawes to Richmond did repair,
 It chanced that I saw standing in a dell
 Three aspens at three corners of a square ;
 And one, not four yards distant, near a well.

What this imported I could ill divine :
 And, pulling now the rein my horse to stop,
 I saw three pillars standing in a line,
 The last stone pillar on a dark hill-top.

The trees were gray, with neither arms nor head ;
 Half-wasted the square mound of tawny green ;
 So that you just might say, as then I said,
 " Here in old time the hand of man hath been."

I looked upon the hill both far and near,
 More doleful place did never eye survey ;
 It seemed as if the spring-time came not here,
 And nature here were willing to decay.

I stood in various thoughts and fancies lost,
 When one, who was in shepherd's garb attired,
 Came up the hollow :—him did I accost,
 And what this place might be I then inquired.

The shepherd stopped, and that same story
 told

Which in my former rhyme I have rehearsed.
 " A jolly place," said he, " in times of old !
 But something ails it now ; the spot is curst.

You see these lifeless stumps of aspen wood—
 Some say that they are beeches, others elms—
 These were the bower ; and here a mansion stood,
 The finest palace of a hundred realms !

The harbour does its own condition tell ;
You see the stoues, the fountain, and the stream,
But as to the great lodge ! you might as well
Hunt half a day for a forgotten dream.

There's neither dog nor heifer, horse nor sheep,
Will wet his lips within that cup of stone ;
And oftentimes, when all are fast asleep,
This water doth send forth a dolorous groan.

Some say that here a murder has been done,
And blood cries out for blood : but, for my part,
I've guessed, when I've been sitting in the sun,
That it was all for that unhappy hart.

What thoughts must through the creature's brain have past !
Even from the topmost stone, upon the steep.
Are but three bounds—and look, sir, at this last—
—O master ! it has been a cruel leap.

For thirteen hours he ran a desperate race ;
And in my simple mind we cannot tell
What cause the hart might have to love this place,
And come and make his death-bed near the well.

Here on the grass perhaps asleep he sank,
Lulled by the fountain in the summer-tide ;
This water was perhaps the first he drank
When he had wandered from his mother's side.

In April here beneath the scented thorn
He heard the birds their morning carols sing :
And he, perhaps, for aught we know, was born
Not half a furlong from that self-same spring.

Now, here is neither grass nor pleasant shade ;
The sun on drearier hollow never shone ;
So will it be, as I have often said,
Till trees, and stoues, and fountain all are gone."

" Gray-headed shepherd, thou hast spoken well ;
Small difference lies between thy creed and
mine :
This beast not unobserved by nature fell ;
His death was mourned by sympathy divine !

The being, that is in the clouds and air,
That is in the green leaves among the groves,
Maintains a deep and reverential care
For the unoffending creatures whom he loves.

The pleasure-house is dust :—behind, before,
This is no common waste, no common gloom ;
But nature, in due course of time, once more
Shall here put on her beauty and her bloom.

She leaves these objects to a slow decay,
That what we are, and have been, may be known ;

But, at the coming of the milder day,
These monuments shall all be overgrown.

One lesson, shepherd, let us too divide,
Taught both by what she shows, and what conceals,
Never to blend our pleasure or our pride
With sorrow of the meanest thing that feels."

LINES TO THE RIVER WYE.

Five years have past ; five summers, with the length

Of five long winters ! and again I hear
These waters, rolling from their mountain-springs

With a sweet inland murmur.—Once again
Do I behold these steep and lofty cliffs,
That on a wild secluded scene impress
Thoughts of more deep seclusion ; and connect

The landscape with the quiet of the sky.
The day is come when I again repose
Here, under this dark sycamore, and view
These plots of cottage-ground, these orchard-tufts,

Which at this season, with their unripe fruits.
Are clad in one green hue, and lose themselves

Among the woods and copses, nor disturb
The wild green landscape. Once again I see These hedge-rows, hardly hedge-rows, little lines

Of sportive wood run wild : these pastoral farms,
Green to the very door ; and wreaths of smoke
Sent up, in silence, from among the trees !
With some uncertain notice, as might seem
Of vagrant dwellers in the houseless woods,
Or of some hermit's cave, where by his fire
The hermit sits alone.

These beauteous forms,
Through a long absence, have not been to me
As is a landscape to a blind man's eye :
But oft, in lonely rooms, and 'mid the din
Of towns and cities, I have owed to them,
In hours of weariness, sensations sweet,
Felt in the blood, and felt along the heart ;
And passing even into my purer mind,
With tranquil restoration :—feelings too
Of unremembered pleasure : such, perhaps,
As have no slight or trivial influence
On that best portion of a good man's life,
His little, nameless, unremembered acts
Of kindness and of love. Nor less, I trust,
To them I may have owed another gift,
Of aspect more sublime ; that blessed mood,
In which the burthen of the mystery,
In which the heavy and the weary weight
Of all this unintelligible world,
Is lightened :—that serene and blessed mood
In which the affections gently lead us on,— Until the breath of this corporeal frame
And even the motion of our human blood
Almost suspended, we are laid asleep

In body, and become a living soul :
While with an eye made quiet by the power
Of harmony, and the deep power of joy,
We see into the life of things.

If this

Be but a vain belief, yet, oh ! how oft,
In darkness, and amid the many shapes
Of joyless daylight ; when the fretful stir
Unprofitable, and the fever of the world
Have hung upon the beatings of my heart,
How oft, in spirit, have I turned to thee,
O sylvan Wye ! thou wanderer thro' the woods,
How often has my spirit turned to thee !

And now, with gleams of half-extinguished
thought,
With many recognitions dim and faint,
And somewhat of a sad perplexity,
The picture of the mind revives again :
While here I stand, not only with the sense
Of present pleasure, but with pleasing thoughts
That in this moment there is life and food
For future years. And so I dare to hope, Though changed, no doubt, from what I was when first

I came among these hills ; when like a roe
I bounded o'er the mountains, by the sides
Of the deep rivers, and the lonely streams,
Where'er nature led : more like a man
Flying from something that he dreads, than one Who sought the thing he loved. For nature
then

(The coarser pleasures of my boyish days,
And their glad animal movements all gone by)
To me was all in all.—I cannot paint
What then I was. The sounding cataract
Haunted me like a passion : the tall rock,
The mountain, and the deep and gloomy wood,
Their colours and their forms, were then to me
An appetit ; a feeling and a love,
That had no need of a remoter charm,
By thought supplied, or any interest
Unborrowed from the eye.—That time is past,
And all its aching joys are now no more,
And all its dizzy raptures. Not for this
Faint I, nor mourn nor murmur ; other gifts
Have followed, for such loss, I would believe,
Abundant recompense. For I have learned
To look on nature, not as in the hour
Of thoughtless youth ; but hearing oftentimes
The still, sad music of humanity,
Nor harsh nor grating, though of ample power
To chasten and subdue. And I have felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts ; a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man :
A motion and a spirit, that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,

And rolls through all things. Therefore am I still

A lover of the meadows and the woods,
And mountains ; and of all that we behold
From this green earth ; of all the mighty world
Of eye and ear, both what they half create,
And what perceive ; well pleased to recognize
In nature and the language of the sense,
The anchor of my purest thoughts, the nurse,
The guide, the guardian of my heart, and soul
Of all my moral being.

Nor perchance,

If I were not thus taught, should I the more
Suffer my genial spirits to decay :
For thou art with me, here, upon the banks
Of this fair river ; thou, my dearest friend,
My dear, dear friend, and in thy voice I catch
The language of my former heart, and read
My former pleasures in the shooting lights
Of thy wild eyes. Oh ! yet a little while
May I behold in thee what I was once,
My dear, dear sister ! and this prayer I make,
Knowing that Nature never did betray
The heart that loved her ; 'tis her privilege,
Through all the years of this our life, to lead
From joy to joy : for she can so inform
The mind that is within us, so impress
With quietness and beauty, and so feed
With lofty thoughts, that neither evil tongues,
Rash judgments, nor the sneers of selfish men,
Nor greetings where no kindness is, nor all
The dreary intercourse of daily life,
Shall e'er prevail against us, or disturb
Our cheerful faith, that all which we behold
Is full of blessings. Therefore let the moon
Shine on thee in thy solitary walk ;
And let the misty mountain winds be free
To blow against thee : and, in after years,
When these wild ecstasies shall be matured
Into a sober pleasure, when thy mind
Shall be a mansion for all lovely forms,
Thy memory be as a dwelling-place
For all sweet sounds and harmonies ; oh ! then,
If solitude, or fear, or pain, or grief,
Should be thy portion, with what healing
thoughts

Of tender joy wilt thou remember me,
And these my exhortations ! nor, perchance
If I should be where I no more can hear Thy voice, nor catch from thy wild eyes these gleams

Of past existence, wilt thou then forget
That on the banks of this delightful stream
We stood together ; and that I, so long
A worshipper of nature, hither came
Unwearied in that service : rather say
With warmer love, oh ! with far deeper zeal
Of holier love. Nor wilt thou then forget,
That after many wanderings, many years
Of absence, these steep woods and lofty cliffs,
And this green pastoral landscape, were to me
More dear, both for themselves and for thy sake !

ELEGIAC STANZAS.

Suggested by a picture of Pele Castle, in a storm, painted by Sir George Beaumont.

I WAS thy neighbour once, thou rugged pile !
Four summer weeks I dwelt in sight of thee ;
I saw thee every day ; and all the while
Thy form was sleeping on a glassy sea.

So pure the sky, so quiet was the air !
So like, so very like, was day to day !
Whene'er I looked, thy image still was there ;
It trembled, but it never passed away.

How perfect was the calm ! it seemed no sleep ;
No mood, which season takes away, or brings :
I could have fancied that the mighty deep
Was even the gentlest of all gentle things.

Ah ! THEN, if mine had been the painter's hand,
To express what then I saw ; and add the gleam,
The light that never was, on sea or land,
The consecration, and the poet's dream ;

I would have planted thee, thou hoary pile
Amid a world how different from this !
Beside a sea that could not cease to smile ;
On tranquil land, beneath a sky of bliss.

A picture had it been of lasting ease,
Elysian quiet, without toil or strife ;
No motion but the moving tide, a breeze,
Or merely silent nature's breathing life.

Such, in the fond illusion of my heart,
Such picture would I at that time have made :
And seen the soul of truth in every part ;
A faith, a trust, that could not be betrayed.

So once it would have been,—'tis so no more :
I have submitted to a new control :
A power is gone, which nothing can restore ;
A deep distress hath humanised my soul.

Not for a moment could I now behold
A smiling sea, and be what I have been :
The feeling of my loss will ne'er be old ;
This, which I know, I speak with mind serene.

Then, Beaumont, friend ! who would have been the friend,
If he had lived, of him whom I deplore,
This work of thine I blame not, but commend ;
This sea in anger, and that dismal shore.

O 'tis a passionate work !—yet wise and well ;
Well chosen is the spirit that is here ;
That hulk which labours in the deadly swell,
This rueful sky, this pageantry of fear !

And this huge castle, standing here sublime,
I love to see the look with which it braves,
Cased in the unfeeling armour of old time,
The lightning, the fierce wind, and trampling waves.

Farewell, farewell the heart that lives alone,
Housed in a dream, at distance from the kind !
Such happiness, wherever it be known,
Is to be pitied ; for 'tis surely blind.

But welcome fortitude, and patient cheer,
And frequent sights of what is to be borne !
Such sights, or worse, as are before me here.—
Not without hope we suffer and we mourn.

TO THE CUCKOO.

O BLITHE new-comer ! I have heard,
I hear thee and rejoice.
O Cuckoo ! shall I call thee bird,
Or but a wandering voice ?

While I am lying on the grass
Thy twofold shout I hear,
That seems to fill the whole air's space,
As loud far off as near.

Though babbling only, to the vale,
Of sunshine and of flowers,
Thou bringest unto me a tale
Of visionary hours.

Thrice welcome, darling of the spring !
Even yet thou art to me
No bird : but an invisible thing,
A voice, a mystery ;

The same whom in my school-boy days
I listened to ; that cry
Which made me look a thousand ways
In bush, and tree, and sky.

To seek thee did I often rove
Through woods and on the green ;
And thou wert still a hope, a love ;
Still longed for, never seen.

And I can listen to thee yet ;
Can lie upon the plain
And listen, till I do forget
That golden time again.

O blessed bird ! the earth we pace
Again appears to be
An unsubstantial, faery place ;
That is fit home for thee !

LUCY.

SHE dwelt among the untrodden ways
Beside the springs of Dove,
A maid whom there were none to praise
And very few to love :

A violet by a mossy stone
Half hidden from the eye !
—Fair as a star, when only one
Is shining in the sky.

She lived unknown, and few could know
When Lucy ceased to be ;
But she is in her grave, and, oh,
The difference to me !

A POET'S EPITAPH.

ART thou a statesman, in the van
Of public business trained and bred?
—First learn to love one living man;
Then may'st thou think upon the dead.

A lawyer art thou?—draw not nigh:
Go, carry to some fitter place
The keenness of that practised eye,
The hardness of that fallow face.

Art thou a man of purple cheer?
A rosy man, right plump to see?
Approach; yet, doctor, not too near:
This grave, no cushion is for thee.

Or art thou one of gallant pride,
A soldier, and no man of chaff?
Welcome!—but lay thy sword aside,
And lean upon a peasant's staff.

Physician art thou? one, all eyes,
Philosopher! a fingering slave,
One that would peep and botanize
Upon his mother's grave?

Wrapt closely in thy sensual fleece,
O turn aside,—and take, I pray,
That he below may rest in peace,
That abject thing, thy soul, away!

—A moralist perchance appears;
Led, heaven knows how! to this poor sod
And he has neither eyes nor ears;
Himself his world, and his own God;

One to whose smooth-rubbed soul can cling
Nor form, nor feeling, great nor small;
A reasoning, self-sufficing thing,
An intellectual all in all!

Shut close the door; press down the latch;
Sleep in thy intellectual crust;
Nor lose ten tickings of thy watch
Near this unprofitable dust.

But who is he, with modest looks,
And clad in homely russet brown?
He murmurs near the running brooks
A music sweeter than their own.

He is retired as noontide dew,
Or fountain in a noon-day grove;
And you must love him, ere to you
He will seem worthy of your love.

The outward shows of sky and earth,
Of hill and valley, he has viewed;
And impulses of deeper birth
Have come to him in solitude.

In common things that round us lie
Some random truths he can impart,
—The harvest of a quiet eye
That broods and sleeps on his own heart.

But he is weak, both man and boy,
Hath been an idler in the land;
Contented if he might enjoy
The things which others understand.

—Come hither in thy hour of strength;
Come, weak as is a breaking wave!
Here stretch thy body at full length;
Or build thy house upon this grave.

LINES,

Written in early Spring.

I HEARD a thousand blended notes,
While in a grove I sate reclined,
In that sweet mood when pleasant thoughts
Bring sad thoughts to the mind.

To her fair works did nature link
The human soul that through me ran;
And much it grieved my heart to think
What man has made of man.

Through primrose tufts, in that sweet bower,
The periwinkle trailed its wreaths;
And 'tis my faith that every flower
Enjoys the air it breathes.

The birds around me hopped and played;
Their thoughts I cannot measure:—
But the least motion which they made,
It seemed a thrill of pleasure.

The budding twigs spread out their fan,
To catch the breezy air;
And I must think, do all I can,
That there was pleasure there.

From Heaven if this belief be sent,
If such be nature's holy plan,
Have I not reason to lament
What man has made of man?

INCIDENT AT BRUGES.

IN Bruges town is many a street
Whence busy life hath fled;
Where, without hurry, noiseless feet,
The grass-grown pavement tread.
There heard we, halting in the shade
Flung from a convent-tower,
A harp that tuneful prelude made
To a voice of thrilling power.

The measure, simple truth to tell,
Was fit for some gay throng;
Though from the same grim turret fell
The shadow and the song.
When silent were both voice and chords
The strain seemed doubly dear,
Yet sad as sweet, for English words
Had fallen upon the ear.

It was a breezy hour of eve ;
 And pinnacle and spire
 Quivered and seemed almost to heave,
 Clothed with innocuous fire ;
 But where we stood, the setting sun
 Showed little of his state ;
 And, if the glory reached the nun,
 'Twas through an iron grate.

Not always is the heart unwise,
 Nor pity idly born.
 If even a passing stranger sighs
 For them who do not mourn.
 Sad is thy doom, self-solaced dove,
 Captive, whoe'er thou be !
 Oh ! what is beauty, what is love,
 And opening life to thee ?

Such feeling pressed upon my soul,
 A feeling sanctified
 By one soft trickling tear that stole
 From the maiden at my side :
 Less tribute could she pay than this,
 Borne gaily o'er the sea,
 Fresh from the beauty and the bliss
 Of English liberty ?

Written in an Album.

SMALL service is true service while it lasts ;
 Of friends, however humble, scorn not one ;
 The daisy, by the shadow that it casts,
 Protects the lingering dew-drop from the sun.

SONNETS.

On the Sonnet.

SCORN not the Sonnet ; critic, you have frowned.
 Mindless of its just honours ; with this key
 Shakspeare unlocked his heart ; the melody
 Of this small lute gave ease to Petrarch's wound ;
 A thousand times this pipe did Tasso sound ;
 Camœns soothed with it an exile's grief ;
 The sonnet glittered a gay myrtle leaf
 Amid the cypress with which Dante crowned
 His visionary brow : a glow-worm lamp,
 It cheered mild Spenser, called from faery-land
 To struggle through dark ways ; and, when a damp
 Fell round the path of Milton, in his hand
 The thing became a trumpet, whence he blew
 Soul-animating strains—alas, too few !

“ BELOVED Vale !” I said, “ when I shall con
 Those many records of my childish years,
 Remembrance of myself and of my peers
 Will press me down : to think of what is gone
 Will be an awful thought, if life have one.”
 But, when into the vale I came, no fears
 Distressed me ; from mine eyes escaped no tears ;
 Deep thought, or awful vision, had I none.

By doubts and thousand petty fancies crost,
 I stood of simple shame the blushing thrall ;
 So narrow seemed the brooks, the fields so small.
 A juggler's balls old time about him tossed ;
 I looked, I stared, I smiled, I laughed ; and all
 The weight of sadness was in wonder lost.

Upon the sight of a Beautiful Picture, painted by Sir G. H. Beaumont, Bart.

PRaised be the Art whose subtle power could stay
 Von cloud, and fix it in that glorious shape ;
 Nor would permit the thin smoke to escape,
 Nor those bright sunbeams to forsake the day ;
 Which stopped that band of travellers on their way.
 Ere they were lost within the shady wood ;
 And showed the bark upon the glassy flood
 For ever anchored in her sheltering bay.
 Soul-soothing Art ! which morning, noon-tide, even,
 Do serve with all their changeful pageantry ;
 Thou, with ambition modest yet sublime,
 Here, for the sight of mortal man, hast given
 To one brief moment caught from fleeting time
 The appropriate calm of blest eternity.

THE world is too much with us ; late and soon,
 Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers ;
 Little we see in nature that is ours ;
 We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon !
 This sea that bares her bosom to the moon ;
 The winds that will be howling at all hours,
 And are up-gathered now like sleeping flowers ;
 For this, for every thing, we are out of tune ;
 It moves us not.—Great God ! I'd rather be
 A pagan suckled in a creed outworn ;
 So might I, standing on this pleasant lea,
 Have glimpses that would make me less forlorn ;
 Have sight of Proteus rising from the sea ;
 Or hear old Triton blow his wreathed horn.

A VOLANT tribe of bards on earth are found,
 Who, while the flattering zephyrs round them
 play,
 On “ coignes of vantage” hang their nests of clay ;
 How quickly from that airy hold unbound,
 Dust for oblivion ! to the solid ground
 Of nature trusts the mind that builds for aye ;
 Convinced that there, there only she can lay
 Secure foundations. As the year runs round,
 Apart she toils within the chosen ring ;
 While the stars shine, or while day's purple eye
 Is gently closing with the flowers of spring ;
 Where even the motion of an angel's wing
 Would interrupt the intense tranquillity
 Of silent hills, and more than silent sky.

Personal Talk.

I AM not one who much or oft delight
 To season my fireside with personal talk,—
 Of friends, who live within an easy walk;
 Of neighbours, daily, weekly, in my sight;
 And, for my chance-acquaintance, ladies bright,
 Sons, mothers, maidens withering on the stalk,
 These all wear out of me, like forms, with chalk
 Painted on rich men's floors, for one feast-
 night.
 Better than such discourse doth silence long,
 Long, barren silence, square with my desire;
 To sit without emotion, hope, or aim,
 In the loved presence of my cottage-fire,
 And listen to the flapping of the flame,
 Or kettle whispering its faint under song.

Continued.

"YET life," you say, "is life; we have seen and
 see,
 And with a living pleasure we describe;
 And fits of sprightly malice do but bribe
 The languid mind into activity.
 Sound sense, and love itself, and mirth and glee
 Are fostered by the comment and the gibe."
 Even be it so: yet still among your tribe,
 Our daily world's true worldlings, rank not
 me!
 Children are blest, and powerful; their world
 lies
 More justly balanced; partly at their feet,
 And part far from them:—sweetest melodies
 Are those that are by distance made more sweet;
 Whose mind is but the mind of his own eyes,
 He is a slave; the meanest we can meet!

Continued.

WINGS have we,—and as far as we can go
 We may find pleasure: wilderness and wood,
 Blank ocean and mere sky, support that mood
 Which with the lofty sanctifies the low.
 Dreams, books, are each a world; and books,
 we know,
 Are a substantial world, both pure and good:
 Round these, with tendrils strong as flesh and blood,
 Our pastime and our happiness will grow.
 There find I personal themes, a plenteous store,
 Matter wherein right voluble I am,
 To which I listen with a ready ear;
 Two shall be named, pre-eminently dear,—
 The gentle lady married to the moor;
 And heavenly Una with her milk-white lamb.

Concluded.

NOW can I not believe but that hereby
 Great gains are mine; for thus I live remote
 From evil-speaking; rancour never sought,
 Comes to me not; malignant truth, or lie.

Hence have I genial seasons, hence have I Smooth passions, smooth discourse, and joyous
 thought:

And thus from day to day my little boat
 Rocks in its harbour, lodging peaceably.
 Blessings be with them—and eternal praise,
 Who gave us nobler loves, and nobler cares—
 The poets, who on earth have made us heirs
 Of truth and pure delight by heavenly lays!
 Oh! might my name be numbered among theirs
 Then gladly would I end my mortal days.

Composed upon Westminster Bridge, Sept. 3, 1803.

EARTH has not any thing to show more fair:
 Dull would he be of soul who could pass by
 A sight so touching in its majesty:
 This city now doth like a garment wear
 The beauty of the morning; silent, bare,
 Ships, towers, domes, theatres, and temples lie
 Open unto the fields, and to the sky;
 All bright and glittering in the smokeless air.
 Never did sun more beautifully steep
 In his first splendour valley, rock, or hill;
 Ne'er saw I, never felt, a calm so deep!
 The river glideth at his own sweet will:
 Dear God! the very houses seem asleep;
 And all that mighty heart is lying still!

O FRIEND! I know not which way I must look
 For comfort, being, as I am, opprest.
 To think that now our life is only drest
 For show; mean handy-work of craftsman, cook,
 Or groom!—We must run glittering like a brook
 In the open sunshine, or we are unblest:
 The wealthiest man among us is the best:
 No grandeur now in nature or in book
 Delights us. Rapine, avarice, expense,
 This is idolatry; and these we adore:
 Plain living and high thinking are no more:
 The homely beauty of the good old cause
 Is gone; our peace, our fearful innocence,
 And pure religion breathing household laws.

MILTON.

MILTON! thou shouldst be living at this hour:
 England hath need of thee: she is a fen
 Of stagnant waters: altar, sword, and pen,
 Fireside, the heroic wealth of hall and bower,
 Have forfeited their ancient English dower
 Of inward happiness. We are selfish men;
 Oh! raise us up, return to us again;
 And give us manners, virtue, freedom, power.
 Thy soul was like a star, and dwelt apart:
 Thou hadst a voice whose sound was like the sea:
 Pure as the naked heavens, majestic, free,
 So didst thou travel on life's common way,
 In cheerful godliness; and yet thy heart
 The lowliest duties on herself did lay.

WHEN I have borne in memory what has tamed
Great nations, how ennobling thoughts depart
When men change swords for ledgers, and desert
The student's bower for gold, some fears unnamed
I had, my country!—am I to be blamed?
But when I think of thee, and what thou
art,
Verily, in the bottom of my heart,
Of those unfilial fears I am ashamed.
But dearly must we prize thee; we who find
In thee a bulwark for the cause of men;
And I by my affection was beguiled:
What wonder if a poet now and then,
Among the many movements of his mind,
Felt for thee as a lover or a child!

THERE is a bondage worse, far worse, to bear
Than his who breathes, by roof, and floor, and wall,
Pent in, a tyrant's solitary thrall:
'Tis his who walks about in the open air,
One of a nation who, henceforth, must wear
Their fetters in their souls. For who could be,
Who, even the best, in such condition, free
From self-reproach, reproach which he must share
With human nature? Never be it ours
To see the sun how brightly it will shine,
And know that noble feelings, manly powers,
Instead of gathering strength, must droop and pine,
And earth with all her pleasant fruits and flowers
Fade, and participate in man's decline.

THE JUNG-FRAU AND THE FALL OF THE RHINE
NEAR SCHAFFHAUSEN.

THE virgin mountain, wearing like a queen
A brilliant crown of everlasting snow,
Sheds ruin from her sides; and men below
Wonder that aught of aspect so serene
Can link with desolation. Smooth and green,
And seeming, at a little distance, slow,
The waters of the Rhine; but on they go
Fretting and whitening, keener and more keen,
Till madness seizes on the whole wide flood,
Turned to a fearful thing whose nostrils breathe
Blasts of tempestuous smoke—wherewith he tries
To hide himself, but only magnifies;
And doth in more conspicuous torment writhe,
Deafening the region in his ireful mood,

A FIELD FLOWER.

On Finding one in full Bloom, on Christmas day, 1803.

THERE is a flower, a little flower,
With silver crest and golden eye,
That welcomes every changing hour,
And weathers every sky.

The prouder beauties of the field
In gay but quick succession shine,
Race after race their honours yield,
They flourish and decline.

But this small flower, to Nature dear,
While moons and stars their courses run,
Wreathes the whole circle of the year,
Companion of the sun.

It smiles upon the lap of May,
To sultry August spreads its charms,
Lights pale October on his way,
And twines December's arms.

The purple heath and golden broom,
On moory mountains catch the gale,
O'er lawns the lily sheds perfume,
The violet in the vale.

But this bold floweret climbs the hill,
Hides in the forest, haunts the glen,
Plays on the margin of the rill,
Peeps round the fox's den.

Within the garden's cultured round
It shares the sweet carnation's bed;
And blooms on consecrated ground
In honour of the dead.

The lambkin crops its crimson gem,
The wild-bee murmurs on its breast,
The blue-fly bends its pensile stem,
Light o'er the sky-lark's nest.

'Tis Flora's page;—in every place,
In every season fresh and fair,
It opens with perennial grace,
And blossoms every where.

On waste and woodland, rock and plain,
Its humble buds unheeded rise;
The rose has but a summer-reign,
The daisy never dies.

THE CAST-AWAY SHIP.

The subjects of the two following poems were suggested by the loss of the Blenheim, commanded by Sir Thomas Trowbridge, which was separated from the vessels under its convoy, during a storm in the Indian Ocean.—The Admiral's son afterwards made a voyage, without success, in search of his father.—Trowbridge was one of Nelson's captains at the Battle of the Nile, but his ship unfortunately ran a-ground as he was bearing down on the enemy.

A VESSEL sail'd from Albion's shore,
To utmost India bound,
Its crest a hero's pendant bore,
With broad sea-laurels crown'd
In many a fierce and noble fight,
Though foil'd on that Egyptian night
When Gallia's host was thrown'd,
And Nelson, o'er his country's foes,
Like the destroying angel rose.

A gay and gallant company,
With shouts that rend the air,
For warrior-wreaths upon the sea,
Their joyful brows prepare:
But many a maiden's sigh was sent,
And many a mother's blessing went,
And many a father's prayer,
With that exulting ship to sea,
With that undaunted company.

The deep that, like a cradled child,
In breathing slumber lay,
More warmly blush'd, more sweetly smiled,
As rose the kindling day:
Through ocean's mirror, dark and clear,
Reflected clouds and skies appear
In morning's rich array;
The land is lost, the waters glow,
'Tis heaven above, around, below.

Majestic o'er the sparkling tide,
See the tall vessel sail,
With swelling wings in shadowy pride,
A swan before the gale;
Deep-laden merchants rode behind:
—But, fearful of the fickle wind,
Britannia's cheek grew pale,
When, lessening through the flood of light,
Their leader vanish'd from her sight.

Oft had she hail'd its trophied prow,
Victorious from the war,
And banner'd masts that would not bow,
Though riven with many a scar;
Oft had her oaks their tribute brought,
To rib its flanks, with thunder fraught;
But late her evil star
Had cursed it on its homeward way,
—"The spoiler shall become the prey."

Thus warn'd, Britannia's anxious heart
'Throbb'd with prophetic woe,
When she beheld that ship depart,
A fair ill-omen'd show!
So views the mother, through her tears,

4 T

The daughter of her hopes and fears,
When hectic beauties glow
On the frail cheek, where sweetly bloom
The roses of an early tomb.

No fears the brave adventurers knew,
Peril and death they spurn'd:
Like full-fledged eagles forth they flew;
Jove's birds, that proudly burn'd,
In battle-hurricanes to wield
His lightnings on the billowy field;
And many a look they turn'd
O'er the blue waste of waves, to spy
A Gallic ensign in the sky.

But not to crush the vaunting foe,
In combat on the main,
Nor perish by a glorious blow,
In mortal triumph slain,
Was their unutterable fate:
—That story would the Muse relate,
The song might rise in vain;
In ocean's deepest, darkest bed,
The secret slumbers with the dead.

On India's long-expecting strand
Their sails were never furl'd—
Never on known or friendly land
By storms their keel was hurl'd;
Their native soil no more they trod,
They rest beneath no hallow'd sod;
Throughout the living world
This sole memorial of their lot
Remains,—they were, and they are not.

The spirit of the Cape pursued
Their long and toilsome way;
At length, in ocean-solitude,
He sprang upon his prey:
'Havoc!' the shipwreck-demon cried,
Loosed all his tempests on the tide,
Gave all his lightnings play;
The abyss recoil'd before the blast,
Firm stood the seamen till the last.

Like shooting stars, athwart the gloom
The merchant-sails were sped;
Yet oft, before its midnight doom,
They mark'd the high mast-head
Of that devoted vessel, tost
By winds and floods, now seen, now lost;
While every gun-fire spread
A dimmer flash, a fainter roar:
—At length they saw, they heard no more.

There are to whom that ship was dear,
For love and kindred's sake;
When these the voice of rumour hear,
Their inmost heart shall quake,
Shall doubt, and fear, and wish, and grieve,
Believe, and long to unbelieve,
But never cease to ache;
Still doom'd, in sad suspense, to bear
The hope that keeps alive despair.

The Sequel.

He sought his sire from shore to shore,
 He sought him day by day ;
 The prow he track'd was seen no more,
 Breasting the ocean-spray :
 Yet, as the winds his voyage sped,
 He sail'd above his father's head,
 Unconscious where it lay,
 Deep, deep beneath the rolling main ;
 —He sought his sire ; he sought in vain.

Son of the brave ! no longer weep ;
 Still with affection true,
 Along the wild disastrous deep,
 Thy father's course pursue ;
 Full in his wake of glory steer,
 His spirit prompts thy bold career,
 His compass guides thee through ;
 So, while thy thunders awe the sea,
 Britain shall find thy sire in thee.

THE ALPS, A REVERIE.Part I. Day.

THE mountains of this glorious land
 Are conscious beings to mine eye,
 When at the break of day they stand
 Like giants, looking through the sky,
 To hail the sun's unrisen car,
 That gilds their diadems of snow ;
 While one by one, as star by star,
 Their peaks in ether glow.

Their silent presence fills my soul,
 When to the horizontal ray
 The many-tinctured vapours roll
 In evanescent wreaths away.
 And leave them naked on the scene,
 The emblems of eternity,
 The same as they have ever been,
 And shall for ever be.

Yet through the valley while I range,
 Their cliffs, like images in dreams,
 Colour and shape, and station change ;
 Here crags and caverns, woods and streams,
 And seas of adamant ice,
 With gardens, vineyards, fields embraced,
 Open a way to paradise
 Through all the splendid waste.

The goats are hanging on the rocks,
 Wide through their pastures roam the herds ;
 Peace on the uplands feeds her flocks,
 Till suddenly the king of birds
 Pouncing a lamb, they start for fear :
 He bears his bleating prize on high ;
 The well-known plaint his nestlings hear,
 And raise a ravening cry.

The sun in morning freshness shines :
 At noon behold his orb o'ercast ;
 Hollow and dreary o'er the pines,
 Like distant ocean, moans the blast :
 The mountains darken at the sound,
 Put on their armour, and anon,
 In panoply of clouds wrapt round,
 Their forms from sight are gone.

Hark ! war in heaven !—the battle-shout
 Of thunder rends the echoing air ;
 Lo ! war in heaven !—thick-flashing out
 Through torrent-rains, red lightnings glare :
 As though the Alps, with mortal ire,
 At once a thousand voices raised ;
 And with a thousand swords of fire
 At once in conflict blazed.

Part II. Night.

Come, golden evening, in the west
 Enthroned the storm-dispelling sun,
 And let the triple rainbow rest
 O'er all the mountain-tops ;—'tis done ;
 The deluge ceases : bold and bright,
 The rainbow shoots from hill to hill ;
 Down sinks the sun ; on presses night ;
 —Mont Blanc is lovely still.

There take thy stand, my spirit ;—spread
 The world of shadows at thy feet ;
 And mark how calmly, overhead,
 The stars like saints in glory meet :
 While hid in solitude sublime,
 Methinks I muse on nature's tomb,
 And hear the passing foot of time
 Step through the gloom.

All in a moment, crash on crash,
 From precipice to precipice,
 An avalanche's ruins dash
 Down to the nethermost abyss :
 Invisible, the ear alone
 Follows the uproar till it dies :
 Echo on echo, groan for groan,
 From deep to deep replies.

Silence again the darkness seals,—
 Darkness that may be felt ;—but soon
 The silver-clouded east reveals
 The midnight spectre of the moon :
 In half-eclipse she lifts her horn,
 Yet, o'er the host of heaven supreme,
 Brings the faint semblance of a morn
 With her awakening beam.

Ha ! at her touch, these Alpine heights
 Unreal mockeries appear ;
 With blacker shadows, ghastlier lights,
 Enlarging as she climbs the sphere ;
 A crowd of apparitions pale !
 I hold my breath in chill suspense,
 —They seem so exquisitely frail,—
 Lest they should vanish hence.

I breathe again, I freely breathe ;
Lake of Geneva ! thee I trace,
Like Dian's crescent far beneath,
And beautiful as Dian's face :
Pride of this land of liberty !
All that thy waves reflect I love ;
Where heaven itself, brought down to thee,
Looks fairer than above.

Safe on thy banks again I stray,
The trance of poesy is o'er,
And I am here at dawn of day,
Gazing on mountains as before ;
For all the strange mutations wrought
Were magic feats of my own mind :
Thus, in the fairy-land of thought,
Whate'er I seek I find.

Yet, O ye everlasting hills !
Buildings of God, not made with hands,
Whose word performs whate'er He wills,
Whose word, though ye shall perish, stands ;
Can there be eyes that look on you,
Till tears of rapture make them dim,
Nor in his works the Maker view,
Then lose his works in Him ?

By me when I behold Him not,
Or love Him not when I behold,
Be all I ever knew forgot ;
My pulse stand still, my heart grow cold ;
Transform'd to ice, 'twixt earth and sky,
On yonder cliff my form be seen.
That all may ask, but none reply.
What my offence hath been.

FRIENDS.

FRIEND after friend departs ;
Who hath not lost a friend ?
There is no union here of hearts,
That finds not here an end :
Were this frail world our only rest,
Living or dying, none were blest.

Beyond the flight of time,
Beyond this vale of death,
There surely is some blessed clime
Where life is not a breath,
Nor life's affections transient fire,
Whose sparks fly upward to expire.

There is a world above,
Where parting is unknown—
A whole eternity of love,
Form'd for the good alone ;
And faith beholds the dying here
Translated to that happier sphere.

Thus star by star declines,
Till all are pass'd away,—
As morning high and higher shines
To pure and perfect day ;
Nor sink those stars in empty night,
—They hide themselves in heaven's own light.

THE DAISY IN INDIA.

Supposed to be addressed by the Reverend Dr. Carey, the learned and illustrious Baptist Missionary at Serampore, to the first plant of this kind, which sprang up unexpectedly in his garden, out of some English earth, in which other seeds had been conveyed to him from this country. With great care and nursing, the Doctor has been enabled to perpetuate the Daisy in India, as an annual only, raised by seed preserved from season to season.

THRICE welcome, little English flower !
My mother-country's white and red,
In rose or lily, till this hour,
Never to me such beauty spread :
Transplanted from thine island-bed,
A treasure in a grain of earth,
Strange as a spirit from the dead,
Thine embryo sprang to birth.

Thrice welcome, little English flower !
Whose tribes, beneath our natal skies,
Shut close their leaves while vapours lower :
But, when the sun's gay beams arise,
With unabash'd but modest eyes,
Follow his motion to the west,
Nor cease to gaze till daylight dies,
Then fold themselves to rest.

Thrice welcome, little English flower,
To this resplendent hemisphere,
Where Flora's giant offspring tower
In gorgeous liveries all the year ;
Thou, only thou, art little here,
Like worth unfriended and unknown,
Yet to my British heart more dear
Than all the torrid zone.

Thrice welcome, little English flower !
Of early scenes beloved by me,
While happy in my father's bower,
Thou shalt the blithe memorial be ;
The fairy sports of infancy,
Youth's golden age, and manhood's prime,
Home, country, kindred, friends,—with thee,
I find in this far clime.

Thrice welcome, little English flower !
I'll rear thee with a trembling hand :
Oh, for the April sun and shower,
The sweet May dews of that fair land,
Where daisies, thick as star-light, stand
In every walk !—that here may shoot
Thy scions, and thy buds expand,
A hundred from one root.

Thrice welcome, little English flower !
To me the pledge of hope unseen ;
When sorrow would my soul o'erpower
For joys that were, or might have been,
I'll call to mind, how, fresh and green,
I saw thee waking from the dust ;
Then turn to heaven with brow serene,
And place in God my trust.

NIGHT.

NIGHT is the time for rest :
How sweet, when labours close,
To gather round an aching breast
The curtain of repose,
Stretch the tired limbs, and lay the head
Down on our own delightful bed !

Night is the time for dreams :
The gay romance of life,
When truth that is, and truth that seems,
Mix in fantastic strife :
Ah ! visions, less beguiling far
Than waking dreams by daylight are !

Night is the time for toil :
To plough the classic field,
Intent to find the buried spoil
Its wealthy furrows yield ;
Till all is ours that sages taught,
That poets sang, and heroes wrought.

Night is the time to weep :
To wet with unseen tears
Those graves of memory, where sleep
The joys of other years ;
Hopes, that were angels at their birth,
But died when young, like things of earth.

Night is the time to watch :
O'er ocean's dark expanse,
To hail the Pleiades, or catch
The full moon's earliest glance,
That brings into the home-sick mind
All we have loved and left behind.

Night is the time for care :
Brooding on hours mispent,
To see the spectre of despair
Come to our lonely tent ;
Like Brutus, 'midst his slumbering host,
Summon'd to die by Cæsar's ghost.

Night is the time to think :
When, from the eye, the soul
Takes flight ; and on the utmost brink
Of yonder starry pole,
Discerns beyond the abyss of night
The dawn of uncreated light.

Night is the time to pray :—
Our Saviour oft withdrew
To desert mountains far away ;
So will his follower do,
Steal from the throng to haunts untrod,
And commune there alone with God.

Night is the time for death :
When all around is peace,
Calmly to yield the weary breath,
From sin and suffering cease,
Think of heaven's bliss, and give the sign
To parting friends ;—such death be mine.

ROBERT SOUTHEY.

Born 1774.

THE MAID OF ORLEANS—HER ACCOUNT OF HERSELF.

[From Joan of Arc.]

“ SEEST thou, Sir Chief, where yonder forest skirts

The Meuse, that in its winding mazes shows
As on the farther bank the distant towers
Of Vaucouleur ? there in the hamlet Arc
My father's dwelling stands ; a lowly hut,
Yet nought of needful comfort did it lack,
For in Lorraine there lived no kinder lord
Than old Sir Robert, and my father Jaques
In flocks and herds was rich. A toiling man
Intent on worldly gains, one in whose heart
Affection had no root. I never knew
A parent's love, for harsh my mother was,
And deem'd the cares which infancy demands
Irk some, and ill-repaid. Severe they were,
And would have made me fear them, but my soul

Possess'd the germ of steady fortitude,
And stubbornly I bore unkind rebuke
And wrathful chastisement. Yet was the voice
That spake in tones of tenderness most sweet
To my young heart ; how have I felt it leap
With transport, when mine uncle Claude approach'd !

For he would place me on his knee, and tell
The wondrous tales that childhood loves to hear,

Listening with eager eyes and open lips
Devoutly in attention. Good old man !
Oh if I ever pour'd a prayer to Heaven
Unhallow'd by the grateful thought of him,
Methinks the righteous winds would scatter it !
He was a parent to me, and his home
Was mine, when in advancing years I found
No peace, no comfort in my father's house.
With him I pass'd the pleasant evening hours,
By day I drove my father's flock afield,
And this was happiness.

Amid these wilds
Often to summer pasture have I driven
The flock ; and well I know these mountain wilds,

And every bosom'd vale, and valley stream
Is dear to memory. I have laid me down
Beside yon valley stream, that up the ascent Scarce sends the sound of waters now, and watch'd

The Beck roll glittering to the noon-tide sun,
And listen'd to its ceaseless murmuring,
Till all was hush'd and tranquil in my soul,
Fill'd with a strange and undefined delight
That pass'd across the mind like summer clouds
Over the lake at eve, their fleeting hues
The traveller cannot trace with memory's eye,

Yet he remembers well how fair they were,
How lovely.

Here in solitude and peace
My soul was nurst, amid the loveliest scenes
Of unpolluted nature. Sweet it was
As the white mists of morning roll'd away
To see the mountain's wooded heights appear
Dark in the early dawn, and mark its slope
With gorse-flowers glowing, as the rising sun
On the golden ripeness pour'd a deepening light.
Pleasant at noon beside the vocal brook
To lie me down, and watch the floating clouds,
And shape to fancy's wild similitudes
Their ever-varying forms; and oh how sweet!
To drive my flock at evening to the fold,
And hasten to our little hut, and hear
The voice of kindness bid me welcome home.
Amid the village playmates of my youth
Was one whom riper years approved a friend.
A gentle maid was my poor Madelon,
I lov'd her as a sister, and long time
Her undivided tenderness possess'd,
Till that a better and a holier tie
Gave her one nearer friend; and then my heart
Partook her happiness, for never lived
A happier pair than Arnaud and his wife.

"Lorraine was call'd to arms, and with her
youth

Went Arnaud to the war. The morn was fair,
Bright shone the sun, the birds sung cheerfully,
And all the fields look'd lovely in the spring;
But to Domremi wretched was that day,
For there was lamentation, and the voice
Of anguish, and the deeper agony
That spake not. Never will my heart forget
The feelings that shot through me, when the horn

Gave its last call, and through the castle-gate
The banner moved, and from the clinging arms
Which hung on them, as for a last embrace
Sons, brethren, husbands went.

More frequent now
Sought I the converse of poor Madelon,
For now she needed friendship's soothing voice.
All the long summer did she live in hope
Of tidings from the war; and as at eve
She with her mother by the cottage door
Sat in the sunshine, if a traveller
Appear'd at distance, coming o'er the brow,
Her eye was on him, and it might be seen
By the flush'd cheek what thoughts were in her
heart,

And by the deadly paleness which ensued
How her heart died within her. So the days
And weeks and months pass'd on, and when the leaves

Fell in the autumn, a most painful hope
That reason own'd not, that with expectation
Did never cheer her as she rose at morn,
Still linger'd in her heart, and still at night
Made disappointment dreadful. Winter came
But Arnaud never from the war return'd,
He far away had perish'd; and when late

The tidings of his certain death arrived,
Sore with long anguish underneath that blow
She sunk. Then would she sit and think all day
Upon the past, and talk of happiness
That never would return, as though she found
Best solace in the thoughts which minister'd
To sorrow: and she loved to see the sun
Go down, because another day was gone,
And then she might retire to solitude
And wakeful recollections, or perchance
To sleep more wearying far than wakefulness,
Dreams of his safety and return, and starts
Of agony; so neither night nor day
Could she find rest, but pin'd and pin'd away.

"DEATH! to the happy thou art terrible,
But how the wretched love to think of thee!
O thou true comforter, the friend of all
Who have no friend beside! by the sick bed
Of Madelon I sate, when sure she felt
The hour of her deliverance drawing near;
I saw her eye kindle with heavenly hope,
I had her latest look of earthly love,
I felt her hand's last pressure—Son of Orleans!
I would not wish to live to know that hour,
When I could think upon a dear friend dead.
And weep not.

I remember as her bier
Went to the grave, a lark sprung up aloft,
And soar'd amid the sunshine carolling
So full of joy, that to the mourner's ear
More mournfully than dirge or passing bell,
His joyful carol came, and made us feel
That of the multitude of beings, none
But man was wretched.

Then my soul awoke,
For it had slumber'd long in happiness,
And never feeling misery, never thought,
What others suffer. I, as best I might,
Solaced the keen regret of Elinor;
And much my cares avail'd, and much her son's,
On whom, the only comfort of her age,
She center'd now her love. A younger birth,
Aged nearly as myself was Theodore,
An ardent youth, who with the kindest cares
Had soothed his sister's sorrows. We had knelt
By her death-bed together, and no bond
In closer union knits two human hearts
Than fellowship in grief.

It chanced as once
Beside the fire of Elinor I sate,
The night was comfortless, the loud blast howl'd,
And as we drew around the social hearth,
We heard the rain beat hard: driven by the storm,

A warrior mark'd our distant taper's light;
We heapt the fire, and spread the friendly board.
'The storm beats hard,' the stranger cried:
'safe hous'd
Pleasant it is to hear the pelting rain.
I too were well content to dwell in peace,
Resting my head upon the lap of love,
But that my country calls. When the winds roar,

Remember sometimes what a soldier suffers,
And think on Conrade.'

Theodore replied,
'Success go with thee! Something we have known

Of war, and tasted its calamity;
And I am well content to dwell in peace,
Albeit inglorious, thanking that good God
Who made me to be happy.

'Did that God,'
Cried Conrade, 'form thy heart for happiness,
When desolation royally careers
Over thy wretched country? did that God
Form thee for peace when slaughter is abroad,
When her brooks run with blood, and rape, and murder, [peace,
Stalk through her flaming towns? live thou in Young man! my heart is human: I do feel
For what my brethren suffer.' While he spake
Such mingled passions character'd his face
Of fierce and terrible benevolence,
That I did tremble as I listen'd to him:
And in my heart tumultuous thoughts arose
Of high achievements, indistinct, and wild,
And vast, yet such they were as made me pant
As though by some divinity possess'd.

'But is there not some duty due to those
We love?' said Theodore; 'Is there an employ
More righteous than to cheer declining age,
And thus with filial tenderness repay
Parental care?'

'Hard is it,' Conrade cried,
'Aye, hard indeed, to part from those we love;
And I have suffer'd that severest pang.
I have left an aged mother; I have left
One, upon whom my heart has center'd all
Its dearest, best affections. Should I live
Till France shall see the blessed hour of peace,
I shall return: my heart will be content,
My highest duties will be well discharged
And I may then be happy. There are those Who deem these thoughts the fancies of a mind
Strict beyond measure, and were well content,
If I should soften down my rigid nature
Even to inglorious ease to honour me.
But pure of heart and high of self-esteem
I must be honour'd by myself: all else,
The breath of fame, is as the unsteady wind
Worthless.'

So saying from his belt he took
The encumbering sword. I held it, listening to him,
And wistless what I did, half from the sheath
Drew forth its glittering blade. I gazed upon it
And shuddering, as I touch'd its edge, exclaim'd,
How horrible it is with the keen sword
To gore the finely-fibred human frame!
I could not strike a lamb.

He answer'd me,
'Maiden, thou hast said well. I could not strike
A lamb, . . . But when the invader's savage fury Spares not grey age, and mocks the infant's shriek

As it doth writhe upon his cursed lance,
And forces to his foul embrace, the wife
Even on her murder'd husband's gasping corse!
Almighty God! I should not be a man
If I did let one weak and pitiful feeling
Make mine arm impotent to cleave him down.
Think well of this, young man!' he cried, and seized

The hand of Theodore; 'think well of this,
As you are human, as you hope to live
In peace, amid the dearest joys of home;
Think well of this! you have a tender mother,
As you do wish that she may die in peace,
As you would even to madness agonize
To hear this maiden call on you in vain
For aid, and see her dragg'd, and hear her scream
In the blood-reeking soldier's lustful arms.
'Think that there are such horrors; that even
now,

Some city flames, and haply as in Roan,
Some famish'd babe on his dead mother's breast
Yet hangs and pulls for food! . . . woe be to those
By whom the evil comes! and woe to him, . .
For little less his guilt, . . who dwells in peace,
When every arm is needed for the strife!'

"When we had all betaken us to rest,
Sleepless I lay, and in my mind revolved
The high soul'd warrior's speech. Then Made-lon

Rose in remembrance; over her the grave
Had closed; her sorrows were not register'd
In the rolls of fame: but when the tears run down

The widow's cheek, shall not her cry be heard
In heaven against the oppressor? will not God
In sunder smite the unmerciful, and break
The sceptre of the wicked? . . thoughts like these

Possess'd my soul, till at the break of day
I slept; nor did my heated brain repose
Even then, for visions, sent, as I believe,
From the Most High, arose. A high-tower'd town

Hemm'd in and girt with enemies, I saw,
Where famine on a heap of carcasses,
Half envious of the unutterable feast,
Mark'd the gorged raven clog his beak with gore.

I turn'd me then to the besieger's camp.
And there was revelry: the loud lewd laugh
Burst on mine ear, and I beheld the chiefs
Sit at their feast, and plan the work of death.
My soul grew sick within me; I look'd up,
Reproaching Heaven, . . lo! from the clouds
an arm

As of the avenging angel was put forth,
And from his hand a sword, like lightning, fell.

"From that night I could feel my burthen'd
soul
Heaving beneath the incumbent Deity.
I sate in silence, musing on the days

To come, unheeding and unseeing all
Around me, in that dreaminess of thought
When every bodily sense is as it slept.
And the mind alone is wakeful. I have heard
Strange voices in the evening wind; strange forms

Dimly discover'd throng'd the twilight air.
The neighbours wonder'd at the sudden change,
And call'd me crazed; and my dear uncle, too,
Would sit and gaze upon me wistfully,
A heaviness upon his aged brow,
And in his eye such trouble, that my heart
Sometimes misgave me. I had told him all,
The mighty future labouring in my breast,
But that the hour methought not yet was come.

"At length I heard of Orleans, by the foe Wall'd in from human succour; there all
thoughts,
All hopes were turn'd; that bulwark once beat down

All was the invader's. Now my troubled soul
Grew more disturb'd, and, shunning every eye,
I loved to wander where the forest shade
Frown'd deepest; there on mightiest deeds to brood

Of shadowy vastness, such as made my heart
Throb loud: anon I paused, and in a state
Of half expectation, listen'd to the wind.

"There is a fountain in the forest call'd
The fountain of the fairies: when a child
With a delightful wonder I have heard
Tales of the elfin tribe who on its banks
Hold midnight revelry. An ancient oak,
The goodliest of the forest, grows beside;
Alone it stands, upon a green grass plat,
By the woods bounded like some little isle.
It ever hath been deem'd their favourite tree;
They love to lie and rock upon its leaves,
And bask in moonshine. Here the woodman leads His boy, and, showing him the green-sward mark'd

With darker circlelets, says their midnight dance
Hath trac'd the ring, and bids him spare the tree.

Fancy had cast a spell upon the place,
And made it holy; and the villagers
Would say that never evil thing approach'd Unpunish'd there. The strange and fearful pleasure.

Which fill'd me by that solitary spring,
Ceased not in riper years; and now it woke Deeper delight and more mysterious awe.

"Lonely the forest spring: a rocky hill
Rises beside it, and an aged yew
Bursts from the rifted crag that overbrows
The waters; cavern'd there unseen and slow
And silently they well. The adder's tongue,
Rich with the wrinkles of its glossy green,
Hangs down its long lank leaves, whose wavy dip
Just breaks the tranquil surface. Ancient woods
Bosom the quiet beauties of the place;

Nor ever sound profanes it, save such sounds
As silence loves to hear, the passing wind,
Or the low murmuring of the stream scarce
heard.

A blessed spot! oh how my soul enjoy'd
Its holy quietness, with what delight
Escaping from mankind I hasten'd there
To solitude and freedom! thitherward
On a spring eve I had betaken me,
And there I sate, and mark'd the deep red clouds

Gather before the wind. . . the rising wind,
Whose sudden gusts, each wilder than the last,
Appear'd to rock my senses. Soon the night
Darken'd around, and the large rain drops fell
Heavy; anon tempestuously the gale
Howl'd o'er the wood. Methought the heavy rain

Fell with a grateful coolness on my head,
And the hoarse dash of waters, and the rush
Of winds that mingled with the forest roar,
Made a wild music. On a rock I sat;
The glory of the tempest fill'd my soul;
And when the thunders peal'd, and the long flash

Hung durable in heaven, and on my sight
Spread the grey forest, memory, thought, were gone,
All sense of self annihilate, I seem'd
Diffus'd into the scene.

At length a light
Approach'd the spring; I saw my uncle Claude:
His grey locks dripping with the midnight storm.
He came, and caught me in his arms, and cried,
'My God! my child is safe!'

I felt his words
Pierce in my heart; my soul was overcharged;
I fell upon his neck and told him all;
God was within me; as I felt, I spake,
And he believed.

Aye, Chieftain, and the world
Shall soon believe my mission; for the Lord
Will raise up indignation, and pour out
His wrath, and they shall perish who oppress."

PROEM TO THE POET'S PILGRIMAGE TO WATERLOO.

I.

ONCE more I see thee, Skiddaw! once again
Behold thee in thy majesty serene,
Where like the bulwark of this favoured plain,
Alone thou standest, monarch of the scene—
Thou glorious mountain, on whose ample breast
The sunbeams love to play, the vapours love to rest!

II.

ONCE more, O Derwent, to thy awful shores
I come, insatiate of the accustomed sight;
And listening as the eternal torrent roars,
Drink in with eye and ear a fresh delight:
For I have wandered far by land and sea,
In all my wanderings still remembering thee.

III.

Twelve years, (how large a part of man's brief
day !)
Nor idly, nor ingloriously spent,
Of evil and of good have held their way,
Since first upon thy banks I pitched my tent.
Hither I came in manhood's active prime,
And here my head hath felt the touch of time.

IV.

Heaven hath with goodly increase blest me here,
Where childless and oppress with grief I came;
With voice of fervent thankfulness sincere
Let me the blessings which are mine proclaim:
Here I possess,—what more should I require?
Books, children, leisure,—all my heart's desire.

V.

O joyful hour, when to our longing home
The long-expected wheels at length drew nigh!
When the first sound went forth, " they come !
they come !"
And hope's impatience quickened every eye !
" Never had man whom Heaven would heap with bliss
More glad return, more happy hour than this."

VI.

Aloft on yonder bench, with arms dispread,
My boy stood, shouting there his father's name,
Waving his hat around his happy head ;
And there a younger group, his sisters came :
Smiling they stood with looks of pleased surprise,
While tears of joy were seen in elder eyes.

VII.

Soon each and all came crowding round to share
The cordial greeting, the beloved sight ;
What welcomings of hand and lip were there !
And when those overflowings of delight
Subsided to a sense of quiet bliss,
Life hath no purer, deeper happiness.

VIII.

The young companion of our weary way
Found here the end desired of all her ills :
She who in sickness pining many a day
Hungered and thirsted for her native hills,
Forgetful now of sufferings past and pain,
Rejoiced to see her own dear home again.

IX.

Recovered now, the homesick mountaineer
Sate by the playmate of her infancy,
Her twin-like comrade—rendered doubly dear
For that long absence : full of life was she,
With voluble discourse and eager mien
Telling of all the wonders she had seen.

X.

Here silently between her parents stood
My dark-eyed Bertha, timid as a dove ;
And gently oft from time to time she wooed
Pressure of hand, or word, or look of love,
With impulse shy of bashful tenderness,
Soliciting again the wished caress.

XI.

The younger twain in wonder lost were they,
My gentle Kate, and my sweet Isabel :
Long of our promised coming, day by day
It had been their delight to hear and tell ;
And now when that long-promised hour was come,
Surprise and wakening memory held them dumb.

XII.

For in the infant mind, as in the old,
When to its second childhood life declines,
A dim and troubled power doth memory hold :
But soon the light of young remembrance shines
Renewed, and influences of dormant love
Wakened within, with quickening influence move.

XIII.

O happy season theirs, when absence brings
Small feeling of privation, none of pain,
Yet at the present object love re-springs,
As night-closed flowers at morn expand again !
Nor deem our second infancy unblest,
When gradually composed we sink to rest.

XIV.

Soon they grew blithe as they were wont to be ;
Her old endearments each began to seek :
And Isabel drew near to climb my knee,
And pat with fondling hand her father's cheek ;
With voice and touch and look reviving thus
The feelings which had slept in long disuse.

XV.

But there stood one whose heart could entertain
And comprehend the fullness of the joy ;
The father, teacher, playmate, was again
Come to his only and his studious boy :
And he beheld again that mother's eye,
Which with such ceaseless care had watched his infancy.

XVI.

Bring forth the treasures now,—a proud display,—
For rich as eastern merchants we return !
Behold the black Beguine, the sister grey,
The friars whose heads with sober motion
turn,
The ark well-filled with all its numerous hives,
Noah and Shem and Ham and Japhet, and their wives.

XVII.

The tumbler, loose of limb ; the wrestlers twain,
And many a toy beside of quaint device,
Which, when his fleecy troops no more can gain
Their pasture on the mountains hoar with ice,
The German shepherd carves with curious knife.
Earning in easy toil the food of frugal life.

XVIII.

It was a group which Richter, had he viewed,
Might have deemed worthy of his perfect skill ;
The keen impatience of the younger brood,
Their eager eyes and fingers never still ;
The hope, the wonder, and the restless joy
Of those glad girls, and that vociferous boy !

XIX.

The aged friend serene with quiet smile,
 Who in their pleasure finds her own delight ;
 The mother's heart-felt happiness the while ;
 'The aunts, rejoicing in the joyful sight ;
 And he who in his gaiety of heart,
 With glib and noisy tongue performed the show-man's part.

XX.

Scoff ye who will ! but let me, gracious Heaven,
 Preserve this boyish heart till life's last day !
 For so that inward light by Nature given
 Shall still direct, and cheer me on my way,
 And brightening as the shades of age descend,
 Shine forth with heavenly radiance at the end.

XXI.

This was the morning light vouchsafed, which led

My favoured footsteps to the Muses' hill,
 Whose arduous paths I have not ceased to tread,
 From good to better persevering still ;
 And if but self-approved, to praise or blame
 Indifferent, while I toil for lasting fame.

XXII.

And O ye nymphs of Castaly divine !
 Whom I have dutifully served so long,
 Benignant to your votary now incline,
 That I may win your ear with gentle song,
 Such as, I ween, is ne'er disowned by you,—
 A low prelusive strain, to nature true.

XXIII.

But when I reach at themes of loftier thought,
 And tell of things surpassing earthly sense,
 (Which by yourselves, O Muses, I am taught,)
 Then aid me with your fuller influence,
 And to the height of that great argument
 Support my spirit in her strong ascent !

XXIV.

So may I boldly round my temples bind
 The laurel which my master Spenser wore ;
 And free in spirit as the mountain wind
 That makes my symphony in this lone hour,
 No perishable song of triumph raise,
 But sing in worthy strains my country's praise.

DESCRIPTIVE PASSAGES FROM "MADOC."

A Voyage of Discovery.

Nor with a heart unmoved I left thy shores,
 Dear native isle ! oh—not without a pang.
 As thy fair uplands lessened on the view,
 Cast back the long involuntary look !
 The morning cheered our outset ; gentle airs
 Curled the blue deep, and bright the summer sun
 Played o'er the summer ocean, when our barks
 Began their way.

And they were gallant barks,
 As ever through the raging billows rode !
 And many a tempest's buffeting they bore.
 Their sails all swelling with the eastern breeze,
 Their tightened cordage clattering to the mast,
 Steady they rode the main ; the gale aloft
 Sung in the shrouds, the sparkling waters hissed

Before, and frothed, and whitened far behind.
 Day after day, with one auspicious wind,
 Right to the setting sun we held our course.
 My hope had kindled every heart ; they blest
 The unvarying breeze, whose unabating strength
 Still sped us onward ; and they said that Heaven
 Favoured the bold emprise.

How many a time,

Mounting the mast-tower-top, with eager ken
 They gazed, and fancied in the distant sky
 Their promised shore, beneath the evening
 cloud,

Or seen, low lying, through the haze of morn !
 I too with eyes as anxious watched the waves,
 Though patient, and prepared for long delay ;
 For not on wild adventure had I rushed
 With giddy speed, in some delirious fit
 Of fancy ; but in many a tranquil hour
 Weighed well the attempt, till hope matured to faith.

Day after day, day after day the same,—
 A weary waste of waters ! still the breeze
 Hung heavy in our sails, and we held on
 One even course ; a second week was gone,
 And now another past, and still the same,
 Waves beyond waves, the interminable sea !
 What marvel, if at length the mariners
 Grew sick with long expectance ? I beheld
 Dark looks of growing restlessness, I heard
 Distrust's low murmuring ; nor availed it long
 To see and not perceive. Shame had awhile
 Represt their fear, till like a smothered fire
 It burst, and spread with quick contagion round,
 And strengthened as it spread. They spake in tones

Which might not be mistaken.—they had done
 What men dared do, ventured where never keel
 Had cut the deep before ; still all was sea,
 The same unbounded ocean !—to proceed
 Were tempting heaven.

I heard with feigned surprise,
 And, pointing then to where our fellow bark,
 Gay with her fluttering streamers and full sail,
 Rode, as in triumph, o'er the element,
 I asked them what their comrades there would deem

Of those so bold ashore, who, when a day,
 Perchance an hour, might crown their glorious toil,

Shrunk then, and coward-like returned to meet
 Mockery and shame ? true, they had ventured on
 In seas unknown, beyond where ever man
 Had ploughed the billows yet : more reason so Why they should now, like him whose happy speed

Well nigh had run the race, with higher hope
 Press onward to the prize. But late they said,
 Marking the favour of the steady gale,
 That Heaven was with us ; Heaven vouchsafed
 • us still

Fair seas and favouring skies ; nor need we pray
 For other aid, the rest was in ourselves ;
 Nature had given it, when she gave to man
 Courage and constancy.

They answered not,
 Awhile obedient ; but I saw with dread
 The silent sullenness of cold assent.
 Then, with what fearful eagerness I gazed,
 At earliest daybreak, o'er the distant deep !
 How sick at heart with hope, when evening closed,
 Gazed through the gathering shadows !—but I saw
 The sun still sink below the endless waves ;
 And still at morn, beneath the farthest sky,
 Unbounded ocean heaved. Day after day,
 Before the steady gale we drove along,—
 Day after day ! the fourth week now had past ;
 Still all around was sea,—the eternal sea !
 So long that we had voyaged on so fast,
 And still at morning where we were at night,
 And where we were at morn, at nightfall still,
 The centre of that drear circumference.
 Progressive, yet no change—almost it seemed
 That we had past the mortal bounds of space,
 And speed was toiling in infinity.
 My days were days of fear, my hours of rest
 Were like a tyrant's slumber. Sullen looks,
 Eyes turned on me, and whispers meant to meet
 My ear, and loud despondency, and talk
 Of home, now never to be seen again,—
 I suffered these, dissembling as I could,
 Till that availed no longer. Resolute
 The men came round me : They had shown enough
 Of courage now, enough of constancy ;
 Still to pursue the desperate enterprise
 Were impious madness ! they had deemed, indeed,
 That Heaven in favour gave the unchanging gale ;
 More reason now to think offended God,
 When man's presumptuous folly strove to pass
 The fated limits of the world, had sent
 The winds, to waft us to the death we sought.
 Their lives were dear, they bade me know, and they
 Many, and I the obstinate but one.
 With that, attending no reply, they hailed
 Our fellow bark, and told our fixed resolve :
 A shout of joy approved. Thus, desperate now,
 I sought my solitary cabin ; there,
 Confused with vague tumultuous feelings, lay,
 And to remembrance and reflection lost,
 Knew only I was wretched.

— Thus entranced
 Cadwallon found me ; shame and grief, and pride,
 And baffled hope, and fruitless anger swelled
 Within me. All is over ! I exclaimed ;
 Yet not in me, my friend, hath time produced
 These tardy doubts and shameful fickleness ;
 I have not failed, Cadwallon ! Nay, he cried,
 The coward fears which persecuted me
 Have shown what thou hast suffered. We have yet
 One hope—I prayed them to proceed a day,—
 But one day more ;—this little have I gained,
 And here will wait the issue ; in yon bark
 I am not needed,—they are masters there.

One only day !—The gale blew strong, the bark
 Sped through the waters ; but the silent hours,
 Which make no pause, went by ; and centered
 still,
 We saw the dreary vacancy of heaven
 Close round our narrow view, when that brief term,
 The last poor respite of our hopes expired.
 They shortened sail, and called with coward
 prayer
 For homeward winds. Why, what poor slaves are we !
 In bitterness I cried ; the sport of chance ;
 Left to the mercy of the elements,
 Or the more wayward will of such as these,
 Blind tools and victims of their destiny !
 Yea, Madoc ! he replied, the elements
 Master indeed the feeble powers of man !
 Not to the shores of Cambria will thy ships Win back their shameful way !—or He, whose will
 Unchains the winds, hath bade them minister
 To aid us, when all human hope was gone,
 Or we shall soon eternally repose
 From life's long voyage.

As he spake, I saw
 The clouds hang thick and heavy o'er the deep ;
 And heavily, upon the long slow swell,
 The vessel laboured on the labouring sea.
 The reef points rattled on the shivering sail ;
 At fits the sudden gust howled ominous,
 Anon with unrelenting fury raged ;
 High rolled the mighty billows, and the blast
 Swept from their sheeted sides the showery foam.
 Vain, now, were all the seamen's homeward hopes,
 Vain all their skill !—We drove before the storm.

'T is pleasant, by the cheerful hearth, to hear
 Of tempests, and the dangers of the deep.
 And pause at times, and feel that we are safe ;
 Then listen to the perilous tale again,
 And with an eager and suspended soul,
 Woo terror to delight us—But to hear
 The roaring of the raging elements,—
 To know all human skill, all human strength,
 Avail not,—to look round, and only see
 The mountain wave incumbent with its weight
 Of bursting waters, o'er the reeling bark,—
 O God, this is indeed a dreadful thing !
 And he who hath endured the horror once
 Of such an hour doth never hear the storm
 Howl round his home, but he remembers it,
 And thinks upon the suffering mariner !

Onward we drove : with unabating force
 The tempest raged ; night added to the storm
 New horrors, and the morn arose, o'erspread
 With heavier clouds. The weary mariners
 Called on Saint Cyric's aid ; and I too placed
 My hope on heaven, relaxing not the while
 Our human efforts. Ye who dwell at home,
 Ye do not know the terrors of the main !
 When the winds blow, ye walk along the shore,
 And, as the curling billows leap and toss,

Fable that Ocean's mermaid shepherdess
 Drives her white flocks afield, and warns in time
 The wary fisherman. Gwenddwy warned us
 When we had no retreat! My secret heart
 Almost had failed me.—Were the elements
 Confounded in perpetual conflict here,
 Sea, air, and heaven? Or were we perishing
 Where at their source the floods, for ever thus,
 Beneath the nearer influence of the moon, Labour'd in these mad workings? Did the waters

Here on their outmost circle meet the void,
 The verge and brink of Chaos? or this Earth,—
 Was it indeed a living thing—its breath
 The ebb and flow of ocean? and had we Reached the storm rampart of its sanctuary,
 The insuperable boundary, raised to guard
 Its mysteries from the eye of man profane?
 Three dreadful nights and days we drove along;
 The fourth, the welcome rain came rattling
 down:

The wind had fallen, and through the broken
 cloud

Appeared the bright dilating blue of heaven.
 Embolden'd now, I called the mariners:—
 Vain were it should we bend a homeward course,
 Driven by the storm so far: they saw our barks,
 For service of that long and perilous way,
 Disabled, and our food belike to fail.
 Silent they heard, reluctant in assent:
 Anon, they shouted joyfully,—I looked
 And saw a bird slow sailing overhead,
 His long white pinions by the sunbeam edged
 As though with burnished silver;—never yet
 Heard I so sweet a music as his cry!

Yet three days more, and hope more eager now,
 Sure of the signs of land,—weed-shoals, and birds

Who flocked the main, and gentle airs which breathed,

Or seemed to breathe, fresh fragrance from the shore.

On the last evening, a long shadowy line
 Skirted the sea;—how fast the night closed in!
 I stood upon the deck, and watched till dawn.
 But who can tell what feelings filled my heart,
 When like a cloud the distant land arose
 Grey from the ocean,—when we left the ship,
 And cleft, with rapid oars, the shallow wave,
 And stood triumphant on another world!

A Beautiful Day.

THERE was not, on that day, a speck to stain
 The azure heaven; the blessed sun, alone,
 In unapproachable divinity,
 Career'd, rejoicing in his fields of light.
 How beautiful, beneath the bright blue sky,
 The billows heave! one glowing green expanse,
 Save where along the hending line of shore
 Such hue is thrown, as when the peacock's neck
 Assumes its proudest tint of amethyst,
 Embathed in emerald glory. All the flocks

Of ocean are abroad: like floating foam,
 The sea gulls rise and fall upon the waves;
 With long protruded neck the cormorants
 Wing their far flight aloft, and round and round
 The plovers wheel, and give their note of joy.
 It was a day that sent into the heart
 A summer feeling: even the insect swarms
 From their dark nooks and coverts issued forth,
 To sport through one day of existence more;
 The solitary primrose on the bank
 Seemed now as though it had no cause to mourn
 Its bleak autumnal birth; the rocks, and shores,
 The forest and the everlasting hills,
 Smiled in that joyful sunshine,—they partook
 The universal blessing.

A Religious Temple.

THE place

Was holy;—the dead air, which underneath
 Those arches never felt the healthy sun,
 Nor the free motion of the elements,
 Chilly and damp, infused associate awe:
 The sacred odours of the incense still
 Floated; the daylight and the taper flames
 Commingled, dimming each, and each bedim-
 med;

And as the slow procession paced along,
 Still to their hymn, as if in symphony,
 The regular foot-fall sounded: swelling now,
 Their voices in one chorus, loud and deep,
 Rang o'er the echoing aisle: and when it ceased,
 The silence of that huge and sacred pile
 Came on the heart.

A Welsh Cottage Scene.

THAT lonely dwelling stood among the hills,
 By a grey mountain-stream: just elevate
 Above the winter torrents did it stand,
 Upon a craggy bank; an orchard slope
 Arose behind, and joyous was the scene
 In early summer, when those antic trees
 Shone with their blushing blossoms, and the flax
 Twinkled beneath the breeze its liveliest green.
 But, save the flax-field and that orchard slope,
 All else was desolate, and now all wore
 One sober hue: the narrow vale which wound
 Among the hills, was grey with rocks, that peered

Above its shallow soil; the mountain side
 Was loose with stones bestrewn, which oftentimes

Clattered adown the steep, beneath the foot
 Of straggling goat dislodged, or towered with crags,

One day when winter's work hath loosened them
 To thunder down. All things assorted well
 With that grey mountain hue; the low stone
 lines,

Which scarcely seemed to be the work of man,
 The dwelling rudely reared with stones unhewn,
 The stubble flax, the crooked apple-trees
 Grey with their fleecy moss and misseltoe,
 The white-barked birch now leafless, and the ash

Whose knotted roots were like the rifted rock;

Through which they forced their way. Adown the vale.

Broken by stones and o'er a stony bed,
Rolled the loud mountain-stream.

When Madoc came
A little child was sporting by the brook,
Floating the fallen leaves, that he might see them

Whirl in the eddy now, and now be driven
Down the descent, now on the smother stream
Sail onward far away. But when he heard
The horse's tramp, he raised his head and watched
The prince, who now dismounted and drew nigh.

The little boy still fixed his eyes on him,
His bright blue eyes; the wind just moved the curls

That clustered round his brow; and so he stood,
His rosy cheeks still lifted up to gaze
In innocent wonder.

A Savage's description of the Armies of his Country.

When Madoc bade him tell.
As his life-ransom, what his nation's force,
And what their plans; the savage answered
him,

With dark and sullen eye and smile of wrath,
If aught the knowledge of my country's force
Could profit thee, be sure, ere I would let My tongue play traitor, thou shouldst limb from limb

Hew me, and make each separate member feel
A separate agony of death. O Prince!
But I will tell ye of my nation's force
That ye may know and tremble at your doom;
That fear may half subdue ye to the sword
Of vengeance—Can ye count the stars of Heaven?
The waves which ruffle o'er the lake? the leaves
Swept from the autumnal forest? Can ye look
Upon the eternal snows of yonder height,
And number each particular flake that formed
The mountain-mass?—so numberless they come,
Whoe'er can wield the sword, or hurl the lance,
Or aim the arrow; from the growing boy,
Ambitious of the battle, to the old man,
Who to revenge his country and his gods
Hastens, and then to die. By land they come;
And years must pass away ere on their path
The grass again will grow: they come by lake;
And ye shall see the shoals of their canoes
Darken the waters. Strangers! when our gods
Have conquered, when ye lie upon the stone
Of sacrifice extended one by one,
Half of our armies cannot taste your flesh,
Though given in equal shares, and every share
Minced like a nestling's food!

Madoc replied,
Aztecs, we are few; but through the woods
The lion walks alone. The lesser fowls
Flock multitudinous in heaven, and fly
Before the Eagle's coming. We are few;
And yet thy nation hath experienced us
Enough for conquest.

INSCRIPTIONS.

The three utilities of Poetry: the praise of Virtue and Goodness, the memory of things remarkable, and to invigorate the Affections.—Welsh Triad.

For a column at Newbury.

ART thou a patriot, Traveller?—On this field
Did FALKLAND fall, the blameless and the brave,
Beneath a tyrant's banners—Dost thou boast
Of loyal ardour? HAMBDEN perished here,
The rebel HAMBDEN, at whose glorious name
The heart of every honest Englishman
Beats high with conscious pride. Both uncorrupt.

Friends to their common country both, they fought,

They died in adverse armies. Traveller!
If with thy neighbour thou shouldst not accord,
In charity remember these good men,
And quell all angry and injurious thoughts.

For a tablet on the banks of a stream.

STRANGER! awhile upon this mossy bank
Recline thee. If the sun rides high, the breeze,
That loves to ripple o'er the rivulet,
Will play around thy brow, and the cool sound
Of running waters soothe thee. Mark how clear
It sparkles o'er the shallows, and behold
Where o'er its surface wheels with restless speed
Yon glossy insect, on the sand below
How the swift shadow flits. The stream is pure

In solitude, and many a healthful herb
Bends o'er its course and drinks the vital wave:
But passing on amid the haunts of man,
It finds pollution there, and rolls from thence
A tainted tide. Seek'st thou for HAPPINESS!
Go, stranger, sojourn in the woodland cot
Of INNOCENCE, and thou shalt find her there.

Epitaph on Algernon Sidney.

HERE Sidney lies, he whom perverted law,
The pliant jury and the bloody judge,
Doom'd to the traitor's death. A tyrant king
Required, an abject country saw and shared
The crime. The noble cause of liberty
He loved in life, and to that noble cause
In death bore witness. But his country rose
Like Sampson from her sleep, and broke her chains,

And proudly with her worthies she enroll'd
Her murder'd Sidney's name. The voice of man
Gives honour or destroys; but earthly power
Gives not, nor takes away, the self-applause
Which on the scaffold suffering virtue feels,
Nor that which God appointed its reward.

Epitaph on King John.

JOHN rests below. A man more infamous
Never hath held the sceptre of these realms,
And bruised beneath the iron rod of power
The oppressed men of England. Englishman!
Curse not his memory. Murderer as he was,
Coward and slave, yet he it was who signed

That charter which should make thee morn and night
 Be thankful for thy birth-place :—Englishman !
 That holy charter, which, shouldst thou permit
 Force to destroy, or fraud to undermine,
 Thy children's groans will persecute thy soul,
 For they must bear the burthen of thy crime.

For a tablet at Penshurst.

ARE days of old familiar to thy mind,
 O reader? Hast thou let the midnight hour
 Pass unperceived, whilst thou in fancy lived
 With high-born beauties and enamour'd chiefs,
 Sharing their hopes, and with a breathless joy
 Whose expectation touch'd the verge of pain, Following their dangerous fortunes? If such lore

Hath ever thrill'd thy bosom, thou wilt tread,
 As with a pilgrim's reverential thoughts,
 The groves of Penshurst. Sidney here was born,
 Sidney, than whom no gentler, braver man
 His own delightful genius ever feign'd,
 Illustrating the vales of Arcady
 With courteous courage and with royal loves.
 Upon his natal day the acorn here
 Was planted. It grew up a stately oak,
 And in the beauty of its strength it stood
 And flourish'd, when his perishable part
 Had moulder'd dust to dust. That stately oak

Itself hath moulder'd now, but Sidney's fame
 Endureth in his own immortal works.

Epitaph.

'THIS to a mother's sacred memory
 Her son hath hallowed. Absent many a year
 Far over sea, his sweetest dreams were still
 Of that dear voice which soothed his infancy :
 And after many a fight against the Moor
 And Malabar, or that fierce cavalry
 Which he had seen covering the boundless plain
 Even to the utmost limits where the eye
 Could pierce the far horizon,—his first thought
 In safety was of her, who when she heard
 The tale of that day's danger, would retire
 And pour her pious gratitude to Heaven
 In prayers and tears of joy. The lingering hour.

Of his return, long-look'd-for, came at length,
 And full of hope he reach'd his native shore.
 Vain hope that puts its trust in human life !
 For ere he came the number of her days
 Was full. O reader, what a world were this,
 How unendurable its weight, if they
 Whom death hath sunder'd did not meet again !

Epitaph.

HERE in the fruitful vales of Somerset
 Was Emma born, and here the maiden grew
 To the sweet season of her womanhood
 Beloved and lovely, like a plant whose leaf
 And bud and blossom all are beautiful.
 In peacefulness her virgin years were past ;
 And when in prosperous wedlock she was given
 Amid the Cumbrian mountains far away

She had her summer bower. 'Twas like a dream
 Of old romance to see her when she plied
 Her little skiff on Derwent's glassy lake ;
 The roseate evening resting on the hills,
 The lake returning back the hues of heaven,
 Mountains and vales and waters all imbued
 With beauty and in quietness ; and she,
 Nymph-like, amid that glorious solitude
 A heavenly presence, gliding in her joy.
 But soon a wasting malady began
 To prey upon her, frequent in attack,
 Yet with such flattering intervals as mock
 The hopes of anxious love, and most of all
 The sufferer, self-deceived. During those days
 Of treacherous respite, many a time hath he,
 Who leave this record of his friend, drawn back
 Into the shadow from her social board,
 Because too surely in her cheek he saw
 The insidious bloom of death ; and then her smiles

And innocent mirth excited deeper grief
 Than when long-look'd-for tidings came at last,
 That, all her sufferings ended, she was laid
 Amid Madeira's orange groves to rest.
 O gentle Emma ! o'er a lovelier form
 Than thine, earth never closed ; nor e'er did
 Heaven
 Receive a purer spirit from the world !

Inscription for the apartment in Chepstow Castle, where Henry Marten the regicide was imprisoned thirty years.

FOR thirty years, secluded from mankind,
 Here Marten linger'd. Often have these walls
 Echo'd his footsteps, as with even tread
 He paced around his prison : not to him
 Did nature's fair varieties exist :
 He never saw the sun's delightful beams,
 Save when through yon high bars it pour'd a sad
 And broken splendour. Dost thou ask his crime ?
 He had rebell'd against the king, and sat
 In judgment on him ; for his ardent mind
 Shaped goodliest plans of happiness on earth,
 And peace and liberty. Wild dreams ! but such
 As PLATO loved ; such as, with holy zeal
 Our MILTON worshipp'd. Blessed hopes ! awhile
 From man withheld, even to the latter days,
 When Christ shall come and all things be fulfill'd.

THE BATTLE OF BLENHEIM.

It was a summer evening,
 Old Kaspar's work was done,
 And he before his cottage door
 Was sitting in the sun,
 And by him sported on the green
 His little grandchild Wilhelmine.

She saw her brother Peterkin
 Roll something large and round,
 Which he beside the rivulet
 In playing there had found ;
 He came to ask what he had found,
 That was so large, and smooth, and round.

Old Kaspar took it from the boy,
 Who stood expectant by ;
 And then the old man shook his head,
 And with a natural sigh,
 " 'Tis some poor fellow's scull," said he,
 " Who fell in the great victory.

" I find them in the garden.
 For there's many here about ;
 And often when I go to plough,
 The ploughshare turns them out !
 For many thousand men," said he,
 " Were slain in that great victory,"

" Now tell us what 'twas all about,"
 Young Peterkin, he cries ;
 And little Wilhelmine looks up
 With wonder-waiting eyes ;
 " Now tell us all about the war,
 And what they kill'd each other for."

" It was the English," Kaspar cried,
 " Who put the French to rout ;
 But what they kill'd each other for,
 I could not well make out.
 But every body said," quoth he,
 " That 'twas a famous victory.

" My father lived at Blenheim then,
 Yon little stream hard by ;
 They burnt his dwelling to the ground,
 And he was forced to fly ;
 So with his wife and child he fled,
 Nor had he where to rest his head.

" With fire and sword the country round
 Was wasted far and wide,
 And many a childing mother then,
 And new-born baby, died,
 But things like that, you know, must be
 At every famous victory.

" They say it was a shocking sight
 After the field was won ;
 For many thousand bodies here
 Lay rotting in the sun ;
 But things like that, you know, must be
 After a famous victory.

" Great praise the Duke of Marlbro' won,
 And our good Prince Eugene."
 " Why 'twas a very wicked thing !"
 Said little Wilhelmine.
 " Nay—nay—my little girl," quoth he,
 " It was a famous victory.

" And every body praised the Duke
 Who this great fight did win."
 " But what good came of it at last ?"
 Quoth little Peterkin.
 " Why that I cannot tell," said he,
 " But 't was a famous victory."

THE COMPLAINTS OF THE POOR.

AND wherefore do the poor complain ?
 The rich man asked of me.—
 Come walk abroad with me, I said,
 And I will answer thee.

'T was evening, and the frozen streets
 Were cheerless to behold,
 And we were wrapt and coated well,
 And yet we were a-cold.

We met an old bare-headed man,
 His locks were few and white ;
 I ask'd him what he did abroad
 In that cold winter's night ;

'T was bitter keen indeed, he said,
 But at home no fire had he,
 And therefore he had come abroad
 To ask for charity.

We met a young bare-footed child,
 And she begg'd loud and bold ;
 I ask'd her what she did abroad
 When the wind it blew so cold ;

She said her father was at home,
 And he lay sick a-bed,
 And therefore was it she was sent
 Abroad to beg for bread.

We saw a woman sitting down
 Upon a stone to rest,
 She had a baby at her back
 And another at her breast ;

I ask'd her why she loiter'd there
 When the night-wind was so chill ;
 She turn'd her head and bade the child
 That scream'd behind, be still.

She told us that her husband served,
 A soldier, far away,
 And therefore to her parish she
 Was begging back her way.

We met a girl, her dress was loose
 And sunken was her eye,
 Who with a wanton's hollow voice
 Address'd the passers-by ;

I ask'd her what there was in guilt
 That could her heart allure
 To shame, disease, and late remorse ;
 She answer'd, she was poor.

I turn'd me to the rich man then,
 For silently stood he,—
 You ask'd me why the poor complain,
 And these have answer'd thee !

THE PLEASURES OF HOPE.

[Part the First.]

AT summer eve, when Heaven's ethereal bow
 Spans with bright arch the glittering hills
 below,

Why to yon mountain turns the musing eye,
 Whose sunbright summit mingles with the sky?
 Why do those cliffs of shadowy tint appear
 More sweet than all the landscape smiling near?—

'T is distance lends enchantment to the view,
 And robes the mountain in its azure hue.
 Thus, with delight we linger to survey
 The promised joys of life's unmeasured way;
 Thus, from afar, each dim discover'd scene
 More pleasing seems than all the past hath been:

And every form, that fancy can repair
 From dark oblivion, glows divinely there.

What potent spirit guides the raptured eye
 To pierce the shades of dim futurity?
 Can wisdom lend, with all her heav'nly pow'r,
 The pledge of joy's anticipated hour?
 Ah, no! she darkly sees the fate of man—
 Her dim horizon bounded to a span;
 Or, if she hold an image to the view,
 'T is nature pictured too severely true.
 With thee, sweet HOPE! resides the heavenly
 light,

That pours remotest rapture on the sight:
 Thine is the charm of life's bewilder'd way,
 That calls each slumbering passion into play.
 Waked by thy touch, I see the sister band,
 On tiptoe waiting, start at thy command,
 And fly where'er thy mandate bids them steer,
 To pleasure's path, or glory's bright career.

Primeval HOPE, the Aonian Muses say,
 When man and nature mourn'd their first decay;

When every form of death, and every woe,
 Shot from malignant stars to earth below;
 When murder bared her arm, and rampant war

Yoked the red dragons of her iron car;
 When peace and mercy, banish'd from the plain,

Sprung on the viewless winds to Heav'n again;
 All, all forsook the friendless guilty mind,
 But HOPE, the charmer, linger'd still behind.

Thus, while Elijah's burning wheels prepare
 From Carmel's heights to sweep the fields of air,

The prophet's mantle, ere his flight began,
 Dropt on the world—a sacred gift to man.

Auspicious HOPE! in thy sweet garden grow
 Wreaths for each toil, a charm for every woe;
 Won by their sweets, in nature's languid hour,
 The way-worn pilgrim seeks thy summer bow-
 er;

There, as the wild bee murmurs on the wing,
 What peaceful dreams thy handmaid spirits
 bring!

What viewless forms th' Æolian organ play,
 And sweep the furrow'd lines of anxious thought away!

Angel of life! thy glittering wings explore Earth's loneliest bounds, and Ocean's wildest shore.

Lo! to the wintry winds the pilot yields
 His bark, careering o'er unfathom'd fields;
 Now on Atlantic waves he rides afar,
 Where Andes, giant of the western star,
 With meteor-standard to the winds unfurl'd,
 Looks from his throne of clouds o'er half the world!

Now far he sweeps, where scarce a summer
 smiles

On Behring's rocks, or Greenland's naked isles:
 Cold on his midnight watch the breezes blow,
 From wastes that slumber in eternal snow;
 And waft, across the wave's tumultuous roar,
 The wolf's long howl from Oonalaska's shore.

Poor child of danger, nursling of the storm,
 Sad are the woes that wreck thy manly form!
 Rocks, waves, and winds, the shatter'd bark delay;
 Thy heart is sad, thy home is far away.

But HOPE can here her moonlight vigils keep,
 And sing to charm the spirit of the deep:
 Swift as yon streamer lights the starry pole,
 Her visions warm the watchman's pensive soul;
 His native hills that rise in happier climes,
 The grot that heard his song of other times,
 His cottage home, his bark of slender sail,
 His glassy lake, and broomwood-blossom'd vale,
 Rush on his thought; he sweeps before the wind,
 Treads the loved shore he sigh'd to leave behind;
 Meets at each step a friend's familiar face,
 And flies at last to Helen's long embrace;
 Wipes from her cheek the rapture-speaking tear,
 And clasps, with many a sigh, his children dear!
 While, long neglected, but at length caress'd,
 His faithful dog salutes the smiling guest,
 Points to the master's eyes (where'er they roam)
 His wistful face, and whines a welcome home.

Friend of the brave! in peril's darkest hour,
 Intrepid Virtue looks to thee for power;
 To thee the heart its trembling homage yields,
 On stormy floods, and carnage-cover'd fields,
 When front to front the banner'd hosts combine,
 Halt ere they close, and form the dreadful line.
 When all is still on death's devoted soil,
 The march-worn soldier mingles for the toil;

As rings his glittering tube, he lifts on high
The dauntless brow, and spirit-speaking eye,
Hails in his heart the triumph yet to come,
And hears thy stormy music in the drum !

And such thy strength-inspiring aid that bore
The hardy Byron to his native shore —
In horrid climes, where Chiloe's tempests sweep
Tumultuous murmurs o'er the troubled deep,
'T was his to mourn misfortune's rudest shock,
Scourged by the winds, and cradled on the rock,
To wake each joyless morn, and search again
The famish'd haunts of solitary men ;
Whose race, unyielding as their native storm,
Know not a trace of nature but the form ;
Yet at thy call, the hardy tar pursued,
Pale, but intrepid, sad, but unsubdued
Pierced the deep woods, and hailing from afar,
The moon's pale planet and the northern star ;
Paused at each dreary cry, unheard before,
Hyænas in the wild, and mermaids on the shore ;
Till, led by thee o'er many a cliff sublime,
He found a warmer world, a milder clime,
A home to rest, a shelter to defend,
Peace and repose, a Briton and a friend † !

Congenial Hope ! thy passion-kindling power,
How bright, how strong, in youth's untroubled
hour !

On yon proud height, with genius hand in hand,
I see thee light, and wave thy golden wand.

“ Go, child of Heav'n ! (thy winged words proclaim)

'T is thine to search the boundless fields of fame !

* The following picture of his own distress, given by Byron in his simple and interesting narrative, justifies the above description.

After relating the barbarity of the Indian cacique to his child, he proceeds thus : — “ A day or two after we put to sea again, and crossed the great bay I mentioned we had been at the bottom of when we first hauled away to the westward. The land here was very low and sandy, and something like the mouth of a river which discharged itself into the sea, and which had been taken no notice of by us before, as it was so shallow that the Indians were obliged to take every thing out of their canoes, and carry them overland. We rowed up the river four or five leagues, and then took into a branch of it that ran first to the eastward, and then to the northward : here it became much narrower, and the stream excessively rapid, so that we gained but little way, though we wrought very hard. At night we landed upon its banks, and had a most uncomfortable lodging, it being a perfect swamp, and we had nothing to cover us, though it rained excessively. The Indians were little better off than we, as there was no wood here to make their wigwams ; so that all they could do was to prop up the bark, which they carry in the bottom of their canoes, and shelter themselves as well as they could to the leeward of it. Knowing the difficulties they had to encounter here, they had provided themselves with some seal ; but we had not a morsel to eat, after the heavy fatigues of the day, extending a sort of root we saw the Indians make use of, which was very disagreeable to the taste. We laboured all next day against the stream, and fared as we had done the day before. The next day brought us to the carrying-place. Here was plenty of wood, but nothing to be got for sustenance. We passed this night, as we had frequently done, under a tree ; but what we suffered at this time is not easy to be expressed. I had been three days at the oar without any kind of nourishment except the wretched root above mentioned. I had no shirt, for it had got red off by bits. All my clothes consisted of a short pikeo (something like a bear-skin), a piece of red cloth which had once been a waistcoat, and a ragged pair of trousers, without shoes or stockings.”

† Don Patricio Gedd, a Scotch physician in one of the Spanish settlements, hospitably relieved Byron and his wretched associates, of which the commodore speaks in the warmest terms of gratitude.

Lo ! Newton, priest of nature, shines afar,
Scans the wide world, and numbers ev'ry star !
Wilt thou, with him, mysterious rites apply,
And watch the shrine with wonder-beaming
eye !

Yes, thou shalt mark, with magic art profound,
The speed of light, the circling march of sound ;
With Franklin grasp the lightning's fiery wing,
Or yield the lyre of heav'n another string*.

The Swedish sage† admires, in yonder bowers,
His winged insects, and his rosy flowers ;
Calls from their woodland haunts the savage train
With sounding horn, and counts them on the plain —
So once, at Heav'n's command, the wand'ers came,
To Eden's shade, and heard their various name.

“ Far from the world, in yon sequester'd clime,
Slow pass the sons of wisdom, more sublime ;
Calm as the fields of Heav'n his sapient eye
The loved Athenian lifts to realms on high,
Admiring Plato, on his spotless page,
Stamps the bright dictates of the father sage :
' Shall nature bound to earth's diurnal span
The fire of God, th' immortal soul of man ?'

“ Turn, child of Heav'n, thy rapture-lighten'd eye
To wisdom's walks, the sacred Nine are nigh :
Hark ! from bright spires that gild the Del-
phian height,
From streams that wander in eternal light,
Ranged on their hill, Harmonia's daughter's swell
The mingling tones of horn, and harp, and shell ;
Deep from his vaults, the Loxian murmurs
flow ‡,
And Pythia's awful organ peals below.

“ Beloved of Heav'n ! the smiling muse shall shed
Her moonlight halo on thy beauteous head ;
Shall swell thy heart to rapture unconfin'd,
And breathe a holy madness o'er thy mind.
I see thee roam her guardian pow'r beneath,
And talk with spirits on the midnight heath ;
Inquire of guilty wand'ers whence they came,
And ask each blood-stain'd form his earthly
name ;
Then weave in rapid verse the deeds they tell,
And read the trembling world the tales of hell.

* The seven strings of Apollo's harp were the symbolical representation of the seven planets. Herschell, by discovering an eighth, might be said to add another string to the instrument.

† Linnaeus.

‡ Loxias is the name frequently given to Apollo by Greek writers ; it is met with more than once in the Chærophore of Æschylus.

"When Venus, throned in clouds of rosy hue,
Flings from her golden urn the vesper dew,
And bids fond man her glimmering noon employ,
Sacred to love, and walks of tender joy ;
A milder mood the goddess shall recall,
And soft as dew thy tones of music fall ;
While beauty's deeply-pictured smiles impart
A pang more dear than pleasure to the heart—
Warm as thy sighs shall flow the Lesbian strain,
And plead in beauty's ear, nor plead in vain.

"Or wilt thou Orphean hymns more sacred
deem,
And steep thy song in Mercy's mellow stream ?
To pensive drops the radiant eye beguile—
For beauty's tears are lovelier than her smile ;—
On nature's throbbing anguish pour relief ?
And teach impassion'd souls the joy of grief ?

"Yes ; to thy tongue shall seraph words be given,
And power on earth to plead the cause of Heaven ;
The proud, the cold untroubled heart of stone,
That never mused on sorrow but its own,
Unlocks a generous store at thy command.
Like 'Marek's rocks beneath the prophet's hand*.
The living lumber of his kindred earth,
Charm'd into soul, receives a second birth,
Feels thy dread power another heart afford,
Whose pas- sion-touch'd harmonious strings accord
True as the circling spheres to nature's plan ;
And man the brother, lives the friend of man.

"Bright as the pillar rose at Heaven's command,
When Israel marched along the desert land,
Blazed through the night on lonely wilds afar,
And told the path,—a never-setting star :
So, heavenly genius, in thy course divine,
HORE is thy star, her light is ever thine."

Propitious Power ! when rankling cares annoy
The sacred home of hymenean joy ;
When doom'd to poverty's sequester'd dell,
The wedded pair of love and virtue dwell,
Unpitied by the world, unknown to fame,
Their woes, their wishes, and their hearts the same—

Oh, there, prophetic HORE ! thy smile bestow,
And chase the pangs that worth should never know—

There, as the parent deals his scanty store
To friendless babes, and weeps to give no more,
Tell, that his manly race shall yet assuage
Their father's wrongs, and shield his latter age.
What though for him no Hybla sweets distil,
Nor bloomy vines wave purple on the hill ;
Tell, that when silent years have pass'd away,
That when his eye grows dim, his tresses grey,
These busy hands a lovelier cot shall build,
And deck with fairer flowers his little field,

* See Exodus, chap. xvii. 3, 5, 6.

And call'd from Heaven propitious dew to breathe
Arcadian beauty on the barren heath ;
Tell, that while love's spontaneous smile endears
The days of peace, the sabbath of his years,
Health shall prolong to many a festive hour
The social pleasures of his humble bower.

Lo ! at the couch where infant beauty sleeps,
Her silent watch the mournful mother keeps ;
She, while the lovely babe unconscious lies,
Smiles on her slumbering child with pensive
eyes,
And weaves a song of melancholy joy—
"Sleep, image of thy father, sleep, my boy :
No lingering hour of sorrow shall be thine ;
No sigh that rends thy father's heart and mine ;
Bright as his manly sire the son shall be
In form and soul ; but, ah ! more blest than he !
Thy fame, thy worth, thy filial love, at last,
Shall soothe his aching heart for all the past—
With many a smile my solitude repay.
And chase the world's ungenerous scorn away.

"And say, when summon'd from the world and thee
I lay my head beneath the willow tree,
Wilt thou, sweet mourner ! at my stone appear,
And soothe my parted spirit lingering near ?
Oh, wilt thou come, at evening hour to shed
The tears of memory o'er my narrow bed ;
With aching temples on thy hand reclined,
Muse on the last farewell I leave behind,
Breathe a deep sigh to winds that murmur
low,
And think on all my love, and all my woe ?"

So speaks affection, ere the infant eye
Can look regard, or brighten in reply ;
But when the cherub lip hath learnt to claim
A mother's ear by that endearing name ;
Soon as the playful innocent can prove
A tear of pity, or a smile of love,
Or cons his murmuring task beneath her care,
Or lisps with holy look his evening prayer,
Or gazing, mutely pensive, sits to hear
The mournful ballad warbled in his ear :
How fondly looks admiring HORE the while
At every artless tear, and every smile !
How glows the joyous parent to descry
A guileless bosom, true to sympathy !

Where is the troubled heart, consign'd to share
Tumultuous toils, or solitary care,
Unblest by visionary thoughts that stray
To count the joys of fortune's better day !
Lo, nature, life, and liberty resume
The dim-eyed tenant of the dungeon gloom,
A long-lost friend, or hapless child restored,
Smiles at his blazing hearth and social board ;
Warm from his heart the tears of rapture flow,
And virtue triumphs o'er remember'd woe.

Chide not his peace, proud reason ! nor destroy
 The shadowy forms of uncreated joy,
 That urge the lingering tide of life, and pour
 Spontaneous slumber on his midnight hour.
 Hark ! the wild maniac sings, to chide the gale
 That wafts so slow her lover's distant sail :
 She, sad spectatress, on the wintry shore
 Watch'd the rude surge his shroudless corse
 that bore,
 Knew the pale form, and, shrieking in amaze,
 Clasp'd her cold hands, and fix'd her maddening
 gaze :
 Poor widow'd wretch ! 't was there she wept in vain.
 Till memory fled her agonizing brain :—
 But mercy gave, to charm the sense of woe,
 Ideal peace, that truth could ne'er bestow ;
 Warm on her heart the joys of fancy beam,
 And aimless Hope delights her darkest dream.

Of't when yon moon has climb'd the midnight
 sky,
 And the lone sea-bird wakes its wildest cry,
 Piled on the steep, her blazing faggots burn
 To hail the bark that never can return ;
 And, still she waits, but scarce forbears to weep
 That constant love can linger on the deep.

And, mark the wretch, whose wanderings never knew
 The world's regard, that soothes, though half untrue,

Whose erring heart the lash of sorrow bore,
 But found not pity when it err'd no more.
 Yon friendless man, at whose dejected eye
 Th' unfeeling proud one looks — and passes by,
 Condemn'd on penury's barren path to roam,
 Scorn'd by the world, and left without a home—
 Even he at evening, should he chance to stray
 Down by the hamlet's hawthorn-scented way,
 Where round the cot's romantic glade, are seen
 The blossom'd bean-field, and the sloping green,
 Leans o'er its humble gate, and thinks the while—

Oh ! that for me some home like this would smile
 Some hamlet shade, to yield my sickly form
 Health in the breeze, and shelter in the storm !
 There should my hand no stinted boon assign
 To wretched hearts with sorrow such as mine—
 That generous wish can soothe unpitied care,
 And Hope half mingles with the poor man's prayer.

Hope ! when I mourn, with sympathizing mind,
 The wrongs of fate, the woes of human kind,
 Thy blissful omens bid my spirit see
 The boundless fields of rapture yet to be ;
 I watch the wheels of nature's mazy plan,
 And learn the future by the past of man.

Come, bright Improvement ! on the car of time,
 And rule the spacious world from clime to clime ;

Thy handmaid arts shall every wild explore,
 Trace every wave, and culture every shore.
 On Erie's banks, where tigers steal along.
 And the dread Indian chaunts a dismal song.
 Where human fiends on midnight errands walk,
 And bathe in brains the murderous tomahawk ;
 There shall the flocks on thymy pasture stray,
 And shepherds dance at summer's opening day ;
 Each wandering genius of the lonely glen
 Shall start to view the glittering haunts of men,
 And silence watch, on woodland heights around,
 The village curfew as it tolls profound.

In Lybian groves, where damned rites are done,
 That bathe the rocks in blood, and veil the sun,
 Truth shall arrest the murd'rous arm profane ;
 Wild Obi flies*—the veil is rent in twain.

Where barb'rous hordes on Scythian mountains roam,
 Truth, mercy, freedom, yet shall find a home ;
 Where'er degraded nature bleeds and pines,
 From Guinea's coast to Siber's dreary minest,
 Truth shall pervade the unfathom'd darkness
 there,

And light the dreadful features of despair.—
 Hark ! the stern captive spurns his heavy load,
 And asks the image back that Heaven bestow'd !
 Fierce in his eye the fire of valour burns,
 And, as the slave departs, the man returns.

Oh ! sacred Truth ! thy triumph ceased a while,
 And Hope, thy sister, ceased with thee to smile,
 When leagued oppression pour'd to northern wars
 Her whisker'd pandours and her fierce hussars, Waved her dread standard to the breeze of
 morn,
 Peal'd her loud drum, and twang'd her trumpet
 horn ;
 Tumultuous horror brooded o'er her van.
 Presaging wrath to Poland—and to man† !

Warsaw's last champion from her height sur-
 vey'd,
 Wide o'er the fields, a waste of ruin laid.—
 Oh ! Heaven ! he cried, my bleeding country save !—
 Is there no hand on high to shield the brave ?

* Among the negroes of the West Indies, Obi, or Obiah, is the name of a magical power, which is believed by them to affect the object of its malignity with dismal calamities. Such a belief must undoubtedly have been deduced from the superstitious mythology of their kinsmen on the coast of Africa. I have, therefore, personified Obi as the evil spirit of the African, although the history of the African tribes mentions the evil spirits of their religious creed by a different appellation.

† Mr. Bell of Antermomy, in his travels through Siberia, informs us that the name of the country is universally pronounced sibir by the Russians.

‡ The history of the partition of Poland, of the massacre in the suburbs of Warsaw, and on the bridge of Prague, the triumphant entry of Suwarrow into the Polish capital, and the insult offered to human nature by the blasphemous thanks offered up to Heaven, for victories obtained over men fighting in the sacred cause of liberty, by murderers and oppressors, are events generally known.

Yet, though destruction sweep these lovely plains,
Rise, fellow-men ! our country yet remains !
By that dread name, we wave the sword on high !
And swear for her to live !—with her to die !

He said, and on the rampart-heights array'd
His trusty warriors, few, but undismay'd ;
Firm-paced and slow, a horrid front they form,
Still as the breeze, but dreadful as the storm ;
Low, murmuring sounds along their banners fly,
Revenge, or death,—the watch-word and reply ;
Then peal'd the notes, omnipotent to charm,
And the loud tocsin toll'd their last alarm !—

In vain, alas ! in vain, ye gallant few !
From rank to rank your volley'd thunder flew ;—
Oh, bloodiest picture in the book of time,
Sarmatia fell, unwept, without a crime ;
Found not a generous friend, a pitying foe,
Strength in her arms, nor mercy in her woe !
Dropp'd from her nerveless grasp the shattered spear,
Closed her bright eye, and curl'd her high career ;—
Horr. for a season, bade the world farewell,
And Freedom shrieked—as Kosciuszko fell !

The sun went down, nor ceased the carnage there,
Tumultuous murder shook the midnight air—
On Prague's proud arch the fires of ruin glow,
His blood-dyed waters murmuring far below ;
The storm prevails, the rampart yields a way,
Bursts the wide cry of horror and dismay !
Hark ! as the smouldering piles with thunder fail,
A thousand shrieks for hopeless mercy call !
Earth shook—red meteors flash'd along the sky !
And conscious nature huddl'd at the cry !

Oh ! righteous Heaven ! ere freedom found a grave,
Why slept the sword, omnipotent to save ?
Where was thine arm, O vengeance ! where thy rod
That smote the foes of Zion and of God ;
That crush'd proud Ammon, when his iron car
Was yoked in wrath, and thunder'd from afar ?
Where was the storm that slumber'd till the host [coast ;
Of blood-stain'd Pharaoh left their trembling
Then nade the deep in wild commotion flow,
And heaved an ocean on their march below ?

Departed spirits of the mighty dead !
Ye that at Marathon and Leuctra bled !
Friends of the world ! restore your swords to man
Fight in his sacred cause, and lead the van !
Yet for Sarmatia's tears of blood atone,
And make her arm puissant as your own
Oh ! once again to freedom's cause return
The patriot Tell—the Bruce of Bannockburn !

Yes ! thy proud lords, unpitied land ! shall see
That man hath yet a soul—and dare be free !
A little while, along thy saddening plains,
The starless night of desolation reigns ;
Truth shall restore the light by nature given,
And, like Prometheus, bring the fire of Heaven !
Prone to the dust Oppression shall be hurl'd,
Her name, her nature, wither'd from the world !

Ye that the rising morn invidious mark,
And hate the light—because your deeds are dark ;
Ye that expanding truth invidious view,
And think, or wish, the song of Hope untrue ;
Perhaps your little hands presume to span
The march of genius, and the powers of man ;
Perhaps ye watch, at Pride's unhallow'd shrine,
Her victims, newly slain, and thus divine :—
“ Here shall thy triumph, Genius, cease ; and here
Truth, Science, Virtue, close your short career.”

Tyrants ! in vain ye trace the wizard ring ;
In vain ye limit mind's unwearied spring ;
What ! can ye lull the winged winds asleep,
Arrest the rolling world, or chain the deep ?
No !—the wild wave contemns your sceptred hand ;
It roll'd not back when Canute gave command !

Man ! can thy doom no brighter soul allow ?
Still must thou live a blot on nature's brow ?
Shall war's polluted banner ne'er be furld ?
Shall crimes and tyrants cease but with the world ?
What ! are thy triumphs, sacred Truth, belied ?
Why then hath Plato lived—or Sidney died ?

Ye fond adorers of departed fame,
Who warm at Scipio's worth, orully's name !
Ye that, in fancied vision, can admire
The sword of Brutus, and the Theban lyre !
Wrapt in historic ardour, who adore
Each classic haunt, and well-remember'd shore,
Where Valour tuned, amid her chosen throng,
The Thracian trumpet and the Spartan song :
Or, wandering thence, behold the later charms
Of England's glory, and Helvetia's arms !
See Roman fire in Hampden's bosom swell,
And fate and freedom in the shaft of Tell !
Say, ye fond zealots to the worth of yore,
Hath valour left the world—to live no more ?
No more shall Brutus bid a tyrant die,
And sternly smile with vengeance in his eye ?
Hampden no more, when suffering freedom calls,
Encounter fate, and triumph as he falls ;
Nor Tell disclose, through peril and alarm,
The might that slumbers in a peasant's arm ?

Yes ! in that generous cause, for ever strong,
The patriot's virtue and the poet's song,
Still, as the tide of ages rolls away,
Shall charm the world, unconscious of decay !

Yes! there are hearts, prophetic Hope may trust,
That slumber yet in uncreated dust,
Ordain'd to fire th' adoring sons of earth
With every charm of wisdom and of worth;
Ordain'd to light, with intellectual day,
The mazy wheels of nature as they play,
Or, warm with fancy's energy, to glow,
And rival all but Shakspeare's name below!

And say, supernal Powers! who deeply scan
Heaven's dark decrees, unfathom'd yet by man,
When shall the world call down, to cleanse her shame,
That embryo spirit, yet without a name,—
That friend of nature, whose avenging hands
Shall burst the Lybian's adamantine bands?
Who, sternly marking on his native soil
The blood, the tears, the anguish and the toil,
Shall bid each righteous heart exult, to see
Peace to the slave, and vengeance on the free!

Yet, yet, degraded men! th' expected day
That breaks your bitter cup, is far away;
Trade, wealth, and fashion, ask you still to bleed,
And holy men give Scripture for the deed;
Scourged, and debased, no Briton stoops to save
A wretch, a coward; yes, because a slave!

Eternal Nature! when thy giant hand [land,
Had heaved the floods, and fix'd the trembling
When life sprung startling at thy plastic call,
Endless her forms, and man the lord of all!
Say, was that lordly form inspired by thee,
To wear eternal chains and bow the knee?
Was man ordain'd the slave of man to toil,
Yoked with the brutes, and fetter'd to the soil;
Weigh'd in a tyrant's balance with his gold?
No!—Nature stamp'd us in a heavenly mould!
She bade no wretch his thankless labour urge,
Nor, trembling, take the pittance and the scourge!
No homeless Lybian, on the stormy deep,
To call upon his country's name, and weep!

Lo! once in triumph, on his boundless plain,
The quiver'd chief of Congo loved to reign;
With fires proportion'd to his native sky,
Strength in his arm, and lightning in his eye;
Scour'd with wild feet his sun-illumined zone,
The spear, the lion, and the woods his own!
Or led the combat, bold without a plan,
An artless savage, but a fearless man!

The plunderer came!—alas! no glory smiles
For Congo's chief on yonder Indian isles;
For ever fall'n! no son of nature now,
With freedom charter'd on his manly brow!
Faint, bleeding, bound, he weeps the night away,
And when the sea-wind wafts the dewless day,
Starts, with a bursting heart, for ever more
To curse the sun that lights their guilty shore!
The shrill horn blew*; at that alarm knell

* The negroes in the West Indies are summoned to their morning work by a shell or horn.

His guardian angel took a last farewell!
That funeral dirge to darkness hath resign'd
The fiery grandeur of a generous mind!
Poor fetter'd man! I hear thee whispering low
Unhallow'd vows to guilt, the child of woe!
Friendless thy heart; and canst thou harbour there
A wish but death—a passion but despair?

The widow'd Indian, when her lord expires
Mounts the dread pile, and braves the funeral fires!
So falls the heart at thralldom's bitter sigh!
So virtue dies, the spouse of liberty!

But not to Lybia's barren climes alone,
To Chili, or the wild Siberian zone,
Belong the wretched heart and haggard eye.
Degraded worth, and poor misfortune's sigh!—
Ye orient realms, where Gauges' waters run!
Prolific fields! dominions of the sun!
How long your tribes have trembled and obey'd!
How long was Timour's iron sceptre sway'd*,
Whose marshall'd hosts, the lions of the plain,
From Scythia's northern mountains to the main,
Raged o'er your plunder'd shrines and altars bare,
With blazing torch and gory scymitar,—
Stunn'd with the cries of death each gentle gale,
And bathed in blood the verdure of the vale!
Yet could no pang the immortal spirit tame,
When Brama's children perish'd for his name;
The martyr smiled beneath avenging power,
And braved the tyrant in his torturing hour!

When Europe sought your subject realms to gain,
And stretch'd her giant sceptre o'er the main,
Taught her proud barks the winding way to shape,
And braved the stormy spirit of the Capet;
Children of Brama! then was mercy nigh

* To elucidate this passage, I shall subjoin a quotation from the preface to Letters from a Hindoo Rajah, a work of elegance and celebrity.

"The impostor of Macca had established, as one of the principles of his doctrine, the merit of extending it either by persuasion or the sword, to all parts of the earth. How steadily this injunction was adhered to by his followers, and with what success it was pursued, is well known to all who are in the least conversant in history.

"The same overwhelming torrent which had inundated the greater part of Africa, burst its way into the very heart of Europe, and covering many kingdoms of Asia with unbounded desolation, directed its baneful course to the flourishing provinces of Hindostan. Here these fierce and hardy adventurers, whose only improvement had been in the science of destruction, who added the fury of fanaticism to the ravages of war, found the great end of their conquest opposed, by objects which neither the ardour of their persevering zeal, nor savage barbarity, could surmount. Multitudes were sacrificed by the cruel hand of religious persecution, and whole countries were deluged in blood, in the vain hope, that by the destruction of a part, the remainder might be persuaded, or terrified, into the profession of Mahomedanism.

But all these sanguinary efforts were ineffectual; and at length, being fully convinced, that though they might extirpate, they could never hope to convert, any number of the Hindoos, they relinquished the impracticable idea with which they had entered upon their career of conquest, and contented themselves with the acquirement of the civil dominion and almost universal empire of Hindostan."—Letters from a Hindoo Rajah, by ELIZA HAMILTON.

† See the description of the Cape of Good Hope, translated from Camdens, by Mickles.

To wash the stain of blood's eternal dye?
Did peace descend, to triumph and to save,
When freeborn Britons cross'd the Indian wave?
Ah, no!—to more than Rome's ambition true,
The nurse of freedom gave it not to you!
She the bold route of Europe's guilt began,
And, in the march of nations, led the van!

Rich in the gems of India's gaudy zone,
And plunder piled from kingdoms not their own,

Degenerate trade! thy minions could despise
The heart-born anguish of a thousand cries;
Could lock, with impious hands, their teeming store,

While famish'd nations died along the shore*:
Could mock the groans of fellow-men, and bear
The curse of kingdoms peopled with despair;
Could stamp disgrace on man's polluted name,
And barter, with their gold, eternal shame!

But hark! as bow'd to earth the Bramin kneels,
From heavenly climes propitious thunder peals;
Of India's fate her guardian spirits tell,
Prophetic murmurs breathing on the shell,
And solemn sounds that awe the list'ning mind,
Roll on the azure paths of every wind.

"Foes of mankind! (her guardian spirits say,) Revolving ages bring the bitter day.
When Heaven's unerring arm shall fall on you,
And blood for blood these Indian plains bedew;
Nine times have Brama's wheels of lightning hurl'd

His awful presence o'er the alarmed world†;
Nine times hath guilt, through all his giant frame,

Convulsive trembled, as the mighty came;
Nine times hath suffering mercy spared in vain—
But Heaven shall burst her starry gates again!
He comes! a dead Brama shakes the sunless sky
With murmuring wrath, and thunders from on high,

Heaven's fiery horse, beneath his warrior form,
Paws the light clouds, and gallops on the storm!

* The following account of British conduct, and its consequences, in Bengal, will afford a sufficient idea of the fact alluded to in this passage.

After describing the monopoly of salt, betel-nut, and tobacco, the historian proceeds thus:—"Money in this current came but by drops; it could not quench the thirst of those who waited in India to receive it. An expedient, such as it was, remained to quicken its pace. The natives could live with little salt, but could not want food. Some of the agents saw themselves well situated for collecting the rice into stores; they did so. They knew the Gentooes would rather die than violate the principles of their religion by eating flesh. The alternative would therefore be between giving what they had, or dying. The inhabitants sunk;—they that cultivated the land, and saw the harvest at the disposal of others, planted in doubt—scarcity ensued. Then the monopoly was easier managed—sickness ensued. In some districts the languid living left the bodies of their numerous dead unburied."—Short History of the English Transactions in the East Indies, page 145.

† Among the sublime fictions of the Hindoo mythology, it is one article of belief, that the Deity Brama has descended nine times upon the world in various forms, and that he is yet to appear a tenth time, in the figure of a warrior upon a white horse, to cut off all incorrigible offenders. Avatar is the word used to express his descent.

Wide waves his flickering sword; his bright arms glow

Like summer suns, and light the world below!
Earth, and her trembling isles in ocean's bed,
Are shook; and nature rocks beneath his tread!

"To pour redress on India's injured realm,
The oppressor to dethrone, the proud to whelm;
To chase destruction from her plunder'd shore
With arts and arms that triumph'd once before,
The tenth Avatar comes! at Heaven's command
Small Seriswattee wave her hallow'd wand!
And Camdeo bright, and Ganesa sublime*,
Shall bless with joy their own propitious clime!—
Come, heavenly Powers! primeval peace restore!

Love!—Mercy!—Wisdom!—rule for evermore!"

BATTLE OF THE BALTIC.

Or Nelson and the North,
Sing the glorious day's renown,
When to battle fierce came forth
All the might of Denmark's crown,
And her arms along the deep proudly shone;
By each gun the lighted brand,
In a bold determin'd hand.
And the Prince of all the land
Led them on.—

Like leviathans afloat,
Lay their bulwarks on the brine,
While the sign of battle flew
On the lofty British line:
It was ten of April morn by the chime:
As they drifted on their path,
There was silence deep as death;
And the boldest held his breath,
For a time.—

But the might of England flush'd
To anticipate the scene;
And her van the fleetest rush'd
O'er the deadly space between.
"Hearts of oak!" our captains cried; when each gun

From its adamant lips
Spread a death-shade round the ships,
Like the hurricane eclipse
Of the sun.

Again! again! again!
And the havoc did not slack,
Till a feeble cheer the Dane
To our cheering sent us back;—
Their shots along the deep slowly boom:—
Then ceas'd—and all is wail,
As they strike the shatter'd sail;
Or, in conflagration pale,
Light the gloom.

* Camdeo is the God of Love in the mythology of the Hindoos. Ganesa and Seriswattee correspond to the pagan deities Janus and Minerva.

Out spoke the victor then,
As he hail'd them o'er the wave ;
" Ye are brothers ! ye are men !
And we conquer but to save :—
So peace instead of death let us bring :
But yield, proud foe, thy fleet.
With the crews, at England's feet,
And make submission meet
To our king."—

Then Denmark blest our chief,
That he gave her wounds repose ;
And the sounds of joy and grief
From her people wildly rose,
As death withdrew his shades from the day.
While the sun look'd smiling bright
O'er a wide and woeful sight,
Where the fires of fun'ral light
Died away.

Now joy, old England, raise !
For the tidings of thy might,
By the festal cities' blaze,
While the wine cup shines in light :
And yet amidst that joy and uproar,
Let us think of them that sleep,
Full many a fathom deep,
By the wild and stormy steep,
Elsinore !

Brave hearts ! to Britain's pride
Once so faithful and so true,
On the deck of fame that died,
With the gallant good Riou :
Soft sigh the winds of heav'n o'er their grave !
While the billow mournful rolls,
And the mermaids song condoles,
Singing glory to the souls
Of the brave !

YE MARINERS OF ENGLAND.

A Naval Ode.

YE Mariners of England !
That guard our native seas,
Whose flag has braved, a thousand years,
The battle and the breeze !
Your glorious standard launch again
To match another foe !
And sweep through the deep,
While the stormy tempests blow ;
While the battle rages loud and long,
And the stormy tempests blow.

The spirits of your fathers
Shall start from every wave !—
For the deck it was their field of fame,
And ocean was their grave :
Where Blake and mighty Nelson fell,
Your manly hearts shall glow,
As ye sweep through the deep,
While the stormy tempests blow ;
While the battle rages loud and long,
And the stormy tempests blow.

Britannia needs no bulwark,
No towers along the steep ;
Her march is o'er the mountain-waves,
Her home is on the deep.
With thunders from her native oak,
She quells the floods below,—
As they roar on the shore,
When the stormy tempests blow ;
When the battle rages loud and long,
And the stormy tempests blow.

The meteor flag of England
Shall yet terrific burn,
Till danger's troubled night depart,
And the star of peace return.
Then, then, ye ocean-warriors !
Our song and feast shall flow
To the fame of your name,
When the storm has ceased to blow ;
When the fiery fight is heard no more,
And the storm has ceased to blow.

HOHENLINDEN.

ON Linden, when the sun was low,
All bloodless lay th' untrodden snow,
And dark as winter was the flow
Of Iser, rolling rapidly.

But Linden saw another sight,
When the drum beat, at dead of night,
Commanding fires of death to light
The darkness of her scenery.

By torch and trumpet fast array'd,
Each horseman drew his battle-blade,
And furious every charger neigh'd,
To join the dreadful revelry.

Then shook the hills with thunder riven,
Then rush'd the steed to battle driven,
And louder than the bolts of heaven,
Far flash'd the red artillery.

But redder yet that light shall glow,
On Linden's hills of stained snow,
And bloodier yet the torrent flow
Of Iser, rolling rapidly.

'T is morn, but scarce yon level sun
Can pierce the war-clouds, rolling dun,
Where furious Frank, and fiery Hun,
Shout in their sulph'rous canopy.

The combat deepens. On, ye brave,
Who rush to glory, or the grave !
Wave, Munich ! all thy banners wave !
And charge with all thy chivalry !

Few, few, shall part where many meet !
The snow shall be their winding-sheet,
And every turf beneath their feet
Shall be a soldier's sepulchre.

THE SOLDIER'S DREAM.

Our bugles sang truce—for the night-cloud had lower'd, [sky;
And the sentinel stars set their watch in the
And thousands had sunk on the ground over-power'd,
The weary to sleep, and the wounded to die.

When reposing that night on my pallet of straw,
By the wolf-scaring faggot that guarded the slain,

At the dead of the night a sweet vision I saw,
And thrice ere the morning I dreamt it again.

Methought from the battle-field's dreadful array,
Far, far I had roam'd on a desolate track:
'T was autumn,—and sunshine arose on the way
To the home of my fathers, that welcomed me back.

I flew to the pleasant fields traversed so oft
In life's morning march, when my bosom was young;
I heard my own mountain-goats bleating aloft,
And knew the sweet strain that the corn-reapers sung.

Then pledged we the wine-cup, and fondly I swore [to part;
From my home and my weeping friends never
My little ones kiss'd me a thousand times o'er,
And my wife sobb'd aloud in her fulness of
heart.

Stay, stay with us,—rest, thou art weary and worn;
And fain was their war-broken soldier to stay:
But sorrow return'd with the dawning of morn,
And the voice in my dreaming ear melted away.

THE LAST MAN.

ALL worldly shapes shall melt in gloom,
The sun himself must die,
Before this mortal shall assume
Its immortality!
I saw a vision in my sleep,
That gave my spirit strength to sweep
A down the gulph of time!
I saw the last of human mould,
That shall creation's death behold,
As Adam saw her prime!

The sun's eye had a sickly glare,
The earth with age was wan,
The skeletons of nations were
Around that lonely man!
Some had expired in fight,—the brands
Still rusted in their bony hands;
In plague and famine some!
Earth's cities had no sound nor tread;
And ships were drifting with the dead
To shores where all was dumb!

Yet, prophet-like, that lone one stood
With dauntless words and high,
That shook the sere leaves from the wood,
As if a storm pass'd by,
Saying, We are twins in death, proud Sun,
Thy face is cold, thy race is run,
'Tis mercy bids thee go,
For thou ten thousand thousand years
Hast seen the tide of human tears,
That shall no longer flow.

What though beneath thee man put forth
His pomp, his pride, his skill;
And arts that made fire, flood, and earth,
The vassals of his will;—
Yet mourn I not thy parted sway,
Thou dim disowned king of day:
For all those trophied arts
And triumphs that beneath thee sprang,
Heal'd not a passion or a pang
Entail'd on human hearts.

Go—let oblivion's curtain fall
Upon the stage of men,
Nor with thy rising beams recall
Life's tragedy again.
Its piteous pageants bring not back,
Nor waken flesh, upon the rack
Of pain anew to writhe;
Stretch'd in disease's shapes abhorr'd,
Or mown in battle by the sword,
Like grass beneath the scythe.

Ev'n I am weary in yon skies
To watch thy fading fire;
Test of all sunless agonies,
Behold not me expire.
My lips that speak thy dirge of death—
Their rounded gasp and gurgling breath
To see thou shalt not boast.
The eclipse of nature spreads my pall,—
The majesty of darkness shall Receive my parting ghost!

This spirit shall return to Him
That gave its heavenly spark;
Yet think not, Sun, it shall be dim
When thou thyself art dark!
No! it shall live again, and shine
In bliss unknown to beams of thine,
By Him recall'd to breath,
Who captive led captivity,
Who roll'd the grave of victory,—
And took the sting from death!

Go, Sun, while mercy holds me up
On nature's awful waste,
To drink this last and bitter cup
Of grief that man shall taste—
Go, tell the night that hides thy face,
Thou saw'st the last of Adam's race,
On earth's sepulchral clod,
The dark'ning universe defy
To quench his immortality,
Or shake his trust in God!

THOMAS MOORE.

Born 1780.

PARADISE AND THE PERI.

ONE morn a Peri at the gate
Of Eden stood disconsolate ;
And as she listen'd to the springs
Of Life within, like music flowing,
And caught the light upon her wings
Through the half-open portal glowing,
She wept to think her recreant race
Should e'er have lost that glorious place !

"How happy," exclaim'd this child of air,
"Are the holy spirits who wander there,
'Mid flowers that never shall fade or fall ;
Though mine are the gardens of earth and sea,
And the stars themselves have flowers for me.
One blossom of heaven out-blooms them all !
Though sunny the lake of cool Cashmere,
With its plane-tree isle reflected clear,
And sweetly the founts of that valley fall ;
Though bright are the waters of Sing-su-hay,
And the golden floods that thitherward stray,
Yet—oh, 't is only the blest can say
How the waters of heaven outshine them all !

"Go, wing thy flight from star to star,
From world to luminous world, as far
As the universe spreads its flaming wall ;
Take all the pleasures of all the spheres,
And multiply each through endless years,
One minute of heaven is worth them all !"

The glorious angel, who was keeping
The gates of light, beheld her weeping ;
And as he nearer drew and listen'd
To her sad song, a tear-drop glisten'd
Within his eye-lids, like the spray
From Eden's fountain, when it lies
On the blue flower, which—Bramins say—
Blooms no where but in Paradise !
"Nymph of a fair, but erring line !"
Gently he said—"One hope is thine :
'T is written in the Book of fate,
'The Peri yet may be forgiven,
Who brings to this Eternal Gate
The gift that is most dear to Heaven !"
Go, seek it, and redeem thy sin ;—
'T is sweet to let the pardon'd in !"

Rapidly as comets run
To the embraces of the sun—
Fleeter than the starry brands,
Flung at night from angel hands
At those dark and daring sprites,
Who would climb the empyreal heights—
Down the blue vault the Peri flies,
And, lighted earthly by a glance
That just then broke from morning's eyes,
Hung hovering o'er our world's expanse.

But wither shall the Spirit go
To find this gift for Heaven ?—"I know
The wealth," she cries, "of every urn,
In which unnumber'd rubies burn,
Beneath the pillars of Chilminar ;—
I know where the isles of perfume are,
Many a fathom down in the sea,
To the south of sun-bright Araby ;—
I know too where the Genii hid
The jewell'd cup of their king Jamshid,
With life's elixir sparkling high—'
But gifts like these are not for the sky.
Where was there ever a gem that shone
Like the steps of Alla's wonderful throne ?
And the drops of life—oh ! what would they be
In the boundless deep of Eternity ?"

While thus she mused, her pinions fann'd
The air of that sweet Indian land,
Whose air is balm ; whose ocean spreads
O'er coral rocks and amber beds ;
Whose mountains, pregnant by the beam
Of the warm sun, with diamonds teem ;
Whose rivulets are like rich brides,
Lovely, with gold beneath their tides ;
Whose sandal groves and bowers of spice
Might be a Peri's paradise !
But crimson now her rivers run
With human blood—the smell of death
Came reeking from those spicy bowers,
And man, the sacrifice of man,
Mingled his taint with every breath
Upwasted from the innocent flowers !
Land of the Sun ! what foot invades
Thy pagods and thy pillar'd shades—
Thy cavern shrines and idol stones,
Thy monarchs and their thousand thrones ?
'T is he of Gazna !—fierce in wrath
He comes, and India's diadems
Lie scatter'd in his ruinous path.—
His blood-hounds he adorns with gems,
Torn from the violated necks
Of many a young and loved sultana ;—
Maidens within their pure zenana,
Priests in the very fane he slaughters,
And choaks up with the glittering wrecks
Of golden shrines the sacred waters !

Downward the Peri turns her gaze,
And, through the war-field's bloody haze,
Beholds a youthful warrior stand,
Alone, beside his native river,—
The red blade broken in his hand,
And the last arrow in his quiver.

"Live" said the conqueror, "live to share
The trophies and the crowns I bear !"
Silent that youthful warrior stood—
Silent he pointed to the flood
All crimson with his country's blood,
Then sent his last remaining dart,
For answer, to the invader's heart.
False flew the shaft, though pointed well ;
The tyrant lived, the hero fell !—

Yet mark'd the Peri where he lay,
And, when the rush of war was past,
Swiftly descending on a ray
Of morning light, she caught the last—
Last glorious drop his heart had shed,
Before its free-born spirit fled !

"Be this," she cried, as she wing'd her flight,
"My welcome gift at the gates of Light.
Though foul are the drops that oft distil
On the field of warfare, blood like this,
For Liberty shed, so holy is,
It would not stain the purest rill,
That sparkles among the bowers of Bliss !
Oh ! if there be, on this earthly sphere,
A boon, an offering Heaven holds dear,
'T is the last libation Liberty draws [cause !"
From the heart that bleeds and breaks in her

"Sweet," said the Angel, as she gave
The gift into his radiant hand,
"Sweet is our welcome of the brave,
Who die thus for their native land.—
But see—alas !—the crystal bar
Of Eden moves not—holier far
Than even this drop the boon must be,
That opes the gates of Heaven for thee !"

Her first fond hope of Eden blighted,
Now among Afric's Lunar mountains,
Far to the south, the Peri lighted ;

And sleek'd her plumage at the fountains
Of that Egyptian tide, whose birth
Is hidden from the sons of earth.
Deep in those solitary woods,
Where oft the Genii of the floods
Dance round the cradle of their Nile,
And hail the newborn Giant's smile !
Thence, over Egypt's palmy groves,

Her grotts and sepulchres of kings,
The exiled Spirit sighing roves ;
And now hangs listening to the doves
In warm Roseata's vale—now loves

To watch the moonlight on the wings
Of the white pelicans that break
The azure calm of Mœris' Lake.

'T was a fair scene—a land more bright
Never did mortal eye behold !

Who could have thought, that saw this night
Those valleys and their fruits of gold
Basking in heaven's serenest light ;—
Those groups of lovely date-trees bending
Languidly their leaf-crown'd heads,
Like youthful maids, when sleep descending
Warns them to their silken beds ;—

Those virgin lilies, all the night
Bathing their beauties in the lake,
That they may rise more fresh and bright,
When their beloved sun's awake ;—

Those ruin'd shrines and towers that seem
The relics of a splendid dream ;
Amid whose fairy loneliness

Nought but the lapwing's cry is heard,

Nought seen but (when the shadows, flitting
Fast from the moon, unsheath its gleam)
Some purple winged Sultana sitting Upon a column, motionless
And glittering, like an idol bird !—
Who could have thought that there, e'en there,
Amid those scenes so still and fair,
The Demon of the plague hath cast
From his hot wing a deadlier blast,
More mortal far than ever came
From the red Desert's sands of flame !
So quick, that every living thing
Of human shape, touch'd by his wing,
Like plants where the Simoom hath past,
At once falls black and withering !

The sun went down on many a brow,
Which, full of bloom and freshness then,
Is rankling in the pest-house now,
And ne'er will feel that sun again !
And oh ! to see the unburied heaps
On which the lonely moonlight sleeps—
The very vultures turn away,
And sicken at so foul a prey !
Only the fierce hyæna stalks
Throughout the city's desolate walks
At midnight, and his carnage plies—
Woe to the half-dead wretch, who meets
The glaring of those large blue eyes
Amid the darkness of the streets !

"Poor race of men !" said the pitying Spirit,
"Dearly ye pay for your primal fall—
Some flowrets of Eden ye still inherit,
But the trail of the Serpent is over them all !"
She wept—the air grew pure and clear
Around her, as the bright drops ran ;
For there's a magic in each tear
Such kindly spirits weep for man !

Just then beneath some orange trees,
Whose fruit and blossoms in the breeze
Were wantoning together, free,
Like age at play with infancy—
Beneath that fresh and springing bower,
Close by the lake, she heard the moan
Of one who, at this silent hour,
Had thither stolen to die alone.
One who in life, where'er he moved,
Drew after him the hearts of many ;
Yet now, as though he ne'er were loved,
Dies here, unseen, unwept by any !
None to watch near him—none to slake
The fire that in his bosom lies,
With even a sprinkle from that lake
Which shines so cool before his eyes.
No voice, well-known through many a day,
To speak the last, the parting word,
Which, when all other sounds decay,
Is still like distant music heard :
That tender farewell on the shore
Of this rude world, when all is o'er,
Which cheers the spirit, ere its bark
Puts off into the unknown dark.

Deserted youth! one thought alone
 Shed joy around his soul in death—
 That she, whom he for years had known,
 And loved, and might have call'd his own,
 Was safe from this foul midnight's breath ;—
 Safe in her father's princely halls,
 Where the cool airs from fountain-falls,
 Freshly perfumed by many a brand
 Of the sweet wood from India's land,
 Were pure as she whose brow they fann'd.

But see,—who yonder comes by stealth,
 This melancholy bower to seek,
 Like a young envoy, sent by Health,
 With rosy gifts upon her cheek ?
 'T is she—far off, through moonlight dim,
 He knew his own betrothed bride,
 She, who would rather die with him,
 Than live to gain the world beside !
 Her arms are round her lover now,
 His livid cheek to hers she presses,
 And dips, to bind his burning brow,
 In the cool lake her loosen'd tresses.

Ah ! once, how little did he think
 An hour would come when he should shrink
 With horror from that dear embrace,
 Those gentle arms, that were to him
 Holy as is the cradling place
 Of Eden's infant cherubim !
 And now he yields—now turns away,
 Shuddering as if the venom lay
 All in those proffer'd lips alone—
 Those lips that, then so fearless grown,
 Never until that instant came
 Near his unask'd or without shame.
 Oh ! let me only breathe the air,
 The blessed air, that's breathed by thee,
 And, whether on its wings it bear
 Healing or death, 't is sweet to me !
 There,—drink my tears, while yet they fall,—
 Would that my bosom's blood were balm,
 And, well thou know'st, I'd shed it all,
 To give thy brow one minute's calm.
 Nay, turn not from me that dear face—
 Am I not thine—thy own loved bride—
 The one, the chosen one, whose place
 In life or death is by thy side !
 Think'st thou that she, whose only light,
 In this dim world, from thee hath shone,
 Could bear the long, the cheerless night,
 That must be hers when thou art gone ?
 That I can live, and let thee go,
 Who art my life itself ?—No, no—
 When the stem dies, the leaf that grew
 Out of its heart must perish too !
 Then turn to me, my own love, turn,
 Before like thee I fade and burn ;
 Cling to these yet cool lips, and share
 The last pure life that lingers there !"
 She fails—she sinks—as dies the lamp
 In charnel airs or cavern-damp,
 So quickly do his baleful sighs
 Quench all the sweet light of her eyes !

One struggle—and his pain is past—
 Her lover is no longer living !
 One kiss the maiden gives, one last,
 Long kiss, which she expires in giving !

" Sleep," said the Peri, as softly she stole
 The farewell sigh of that vanishing soul,
 As true as e'er warm'd a woman's breast—
 " Sleep on, in visions of odour rest,
 In balmier airs than ever yet stirr'd
 The enchanted pile of that lonely bird,
 Who sings at the last his own death lay,
 And in music and perfume dies away !
 Thus saying, from her lips she spread
 Unearthly breathings through the place,
 And shook her sparkling wreath, and shed
 Such lustre o'er each paly face,
 That like two lovely saints they seem'd
 Upon the eve of dooms-day taken
 From their dim graves, in odour sleeping ;—
 While that benevolent Peri beam'd
 Like their good angel, calmly keeping
 Watch o'er them till their souls would waken !

But morn is blushing in the sky ;
 Again the Peri soars above,
 Bearing to Heaven that precious sigh
 Of pure, self-sacrificing love.
 High throbb'd her heart, with hope elate,
 The Elysian palm she soon shall win,
 For the bright Spirit at the gate
 Smiled as she gave that offering in ;
 And she already hears the trees
 Of Eden with their crystal bells
 Ringing in that ambrosial breeze
 That from the throne of Alla swells ;
 And she can see the starry bowls
 That lie around that lucid lake,
 Upon whose banks admitted souls
 Their first sweet draught of glory take !

But ah ! even Peris' hopes are vain—
 Again the fates forbade, again
 The immortal barrier closed—" not yet,"
 The angel said as, with regret,
 He shut from her that glimpse of glory,—
 " True was the maiden, and her story,
 Written in light o'er Alla's head,
 By seraph eyes shall long be read.
 But, Peri, see—the crystal bar
 Of Eden moves not—holier far
 Than even this sigh the boon must be
 That opes the gates of Heaven for thee."

Now, upon Syria's land of roses
 Softly the light of Eve reposes,
 And, like a glory, the broad sun
 Hangs over sainted Lebanon,
 Whose head in wintry grandeur towers,
 And whitens with eternal sleet,
 While summer, in a vale of flowers,
 Is sleeping rosy at his feet.

To one who look'd from upper air
 O'er all the enchanted regions there,
 How beauteous must have been the glow,
 The life, the sparkling from below !
 Fair gardens, shining streams, with ranks
 Of golden melons on their banks,
 More golden where the sun-light falls ;—
 Gay lizards, glittering on the walls
 Of ruin'd shrines, busy and bright
 As they were all alive with light ;—
 And, yet more splendid, numerous flocks
 Of pigeons, settling on the rocks,
 With their rich restless wings, that gleam,
 Various in the crimson beam
 Of the warm west—as if inlaid
 With brilliants from the mine, or made
 Of tearless rainbows, such as span
 The unclouded skies of Peristan !
 And then, the mingling sounds that come,
 Of shepherd's ancient reed, with hum
 Of the wild bees of Palestine,
 Banqueting through the flowery vales ;—
 And Jordan, those sweet banks of thine,
 And woods, so full of nightingales !

But nought can charm the luckless Peri ;
 Her soul is sad—her wings are weary—
 Joyless she sees the sun look down
 On that great temple, once his own,
 Whose lonely columns stand sublime,
 Flinging their shadows from on high,
 Like dials which the wizard, Time,
 Had raised to count his ages by !

Yet haply there may lie conceal'd
 Beneath those Chambers of the sun,
 Some amulet of gems, unneal'd
 In upper fires, some tablet seal'd
 With the great name of Solomon,
 Which, spell'd by her illumined eyes,
 May teach her where, beneath the moon,
 In earth or ocean lies the boon,
 The charm that can restore so soon,
 An erring spirit to the skies !

Cheer'd by this hope, she bends her thither .
 Still laughs the radiant eye of Heaven,
 Nor have the golden bowers of Even
 In the rich West begun to wither ;—
 When, o'er the vale of Balbec winging
 Slowly, she sees a child at play,
 Among the rosy wild-flowers singing,
 As rosy and as wild as they ;
 Chasing, with eager hands and eyes,
 The beautiful blue damsel-flies,
 That flutter'd round the jasmine stems,
 Like waving flowers or flying gems :—
 And, near the boy, who tired with play,
 Now nestling 'mid the roses lay,
 She saw a wearied man dismount
 From his hot steed, and on the brink
 Of a small imaret's rustic fount
 Impatient fling him down to drink.

4 x 2

Then swift his haggard brow he turn'd
 To the fair child, who fearless sat,
 Though never yet hath day-beam burn'd
 Upon a brow more fierce than that,— Sullenly fierce—a mixture dire,
 Like thunder clouds, of gloom and fire !
 In which the Peri's eye could read
 Dark tales of many a ruthless deed ;
 The ruin'd maid—the shrine profaned—
 Oaths broken—and the threshold stain'd
 With blood of guests !—there written, all,
 Black as the damning drops that fall
 From the denouncing Angel's pen,
 Ere mercy weeps them out again !

Yet tranquil now that man of crime
 (As if the balmy evening time
 Soften'd his spirit) look'd and lay,
 Watching the rosy infant's play :—
 Though still, when'er his eye by chance
 Fell on the boy's, its lurid glance
 Met that unclouded joyous gaze,
 As torches, that have burnt all night
 Through some impure and godless rite,
 Encounter morning's glorious rays.

But hark ! the vesper-call to prayer,
 As slow the orb of daylight sets,
 Is rising sweetly on the air,
 From Syria's thousand minarets !
 The boy has started from the bed
 Of flowers, where he had laid his head,
 And down upon the fragrant sod
 Kneels, with his forehead to the south,
 Lipping the eternal name of God
 From purity's own cherub mouth,
 And looking, while his hands and eyes
 Are lifted to the glowing skies,
 Like a stray babe of Paradise.
 Just lighted on that flowery plain,
 And seeking for its home again !
 Oh 't was a sight—that Heaven—that child—
 A scene, which might have well beguiled
 Even haughty Eblis of a sigh,
 For glories lost and peace gone by !

And how felt he, the wretched man
 Reclining there—while memory ran
 O'er many a year of guilt and strife,
 Flew o'er the dark flood of his life,
 Nor found one sunny resting-place,
 Nor brought him back one branch of grace !
 " There was a time," he said, in mild
 Heart-humbled tones—" thou blessed child !
 When, young and haply pure as thou,
 I look'd and pray'd like thee—but now—"
 He hung his head—each nobler aim
 And hope and feeling, which had slept
 From boyhood's hour, that instant came
 Fresh o'er him, and he wept—he wept !

Blest tears of soul-felt penitence !
 In whose benign, redeeming flow
 Is felt the first, the only sense
 Of guiltless joy that guilt can know.

"There's a drop," said the Peri, "that down from the moon
Falls through the withering airs of June
Upon Egypt's land, of so healing a power,
So balmy a virtue, that even in the hour
That drop descends, contagion dies,
And health reanimates earth and skies!—
Oh, is it not thus, thou man of sin,
The precious tears of repentance fall?
Though foul thy fiery plagues within,
One heavenly drop hath dispell'd them all!"

And now—behold him kneeling there
By the child's side, in humble prayer,
While the same sun-beam shines upon
The guilty and the guiltless one,
And hymns of joy proclaim through heaven
The triumph of a soul forgiven!

'T was when the golden orb had set,
While on their knees they linger'd yet,
There fell a light more lovely far
Than ever came from sun or star,
Upon the tear that, warm and meek,
Dew'd that repentant sinner's cheek:
To mortal eye this light might seem
A northern flash or meteor beam—
But well the enraptured Peri knew
'T was a bright smile the angel threw
From Heaven's gate, to hail that tear
Her harbinger of glory near!

"Joy, joy for ever! my task is done—
The gates are pass'd, and Heaven is won!
Oh! am I not happy? I am, I am—
To thee, sweet Eden! how dark and sad
Are the diamond turrets of Shadukiam,
And the fragrant bowers of Amherabad!

Farewell, ye odours of earth, that die,
Passing away like a lover's sigh;—
My feast is now of the Tooba-tree,
Whose scent is the breath of eternity!

"Farewell, ye vanishing flowers, that shone
In my fairy wreath, so bright and brief,—
Oh! what are the brightest that e'er have blown,
To the lote-tree, springing by ALLA's throne,
Whose flowers have a soul in every leaf?
Joy, joy for ever!—my task is done—
The gates are pass'd, and Heaven is won!

A CALM.

[From 'The Five Worshipers.']

How calm, how beautiful comes on
The stilly hour, when storms are gone;
When warring winds have died away,
And clouds, beneath the glancing ray,
Melt off, and leave the land and sea
Sleeping in bright tranquillity,—
Fresh as if day again were born,
Again upon the lap of morn!

When the light blossoms, rudely torn
And scatter'd at the whirlwind's will,
Hang floating in the pure air still,
Filling it all with precious balm,
In gratitude for this sweet calm;—
And every drop the thunder-showers
Have left upon the grass and flowers
Sparkles, as 't were that lightning-gem
Whose liquid flame is born of them!
When, stead of one unchanging breeze,
There blow a thousand gentle airs,
And each a different perfume bears,—
As if the loveliest plants and trees
Had vassal breezes of their own
To watch and wait on them alone,
And waft no other breath than theirs!
When the blue waters rise and fall,
In sleepy sunshine mantling all;
And even that swell the tempest leaves
Is like the full and silent heaves
Of lovers' hearts, when newly blest,
Too newly to be quite at rest!

DISSENSION.

[From 'The Light of the Haram.']

Alas—how light a cause may move
Dissension between hearts that love!
Hearts that the world in vain had tried,
And sorrow but more closely tied;
That stood the storm when waves were rough,
Yet in a sunny hour fall off,
Like ships, that have gone down at sea,
When heaven was all tranquillity!
A something, light as air—a look,
A word unkind or wrongly taken—
Oh! love, that tempests never shook.
A breath, a touch like this hath shaken,
And ruder words will soon rush in
To spread the breach that words begin:
And eyes forget the gentle ray
They wore in courtship's smiling day:
And voices lose the tone that shed
A tenderness round all they said;
Till fast declining, one by one,
The sweetnesss of love are gone,
And hearts, so lately mingled, seem
Like broken clouds,—or like the stream,
That smiling left the mountain's brow,
As though its waters ne'er could sever,
Yet, ere it reach the plain below,
Breaks into floods, that part for ever.

LOVE AND REASON.

'T was in the summer-time so sweet,
When hearts and flowers are both in season,
That—who, of all the world, should meet,
One early dawn, but Love and Reason!

Love told his dream of yester-night,
While Reason talk'd about the weather;
The morn, in sooth, was fair and bright,
And on they took their way together.

The boy in many a gambol flew,
While Reason like a Juno stalk'd,
And from her portly figure threw
A lengthen'd shadow as she walk'd.

No wonder Love, as on they pass'd,
Should find that sunny morning chill,
For still the shadow Reason cast
Fell on the boy, and cool'd him still.

In vain he tried his wings to warm,
Or find a path-way not so dim,
For still the maid's gigantic form
Would pass between the sun and him !

"This must not be," said little Love—
"The sun was made for more than you."
So, turning through a myrtle grove,
He bid the portly nymph adieu !

Now gaily roves the laughing boy
O'er many a mead, by many a stream ;
In every breeze inhaling joy,
And drinking bliss in every beam.

From all the gardens, all the bowers,
He cull'd the many sweets they shaded,
And ate the fruits and smelt the flowers,
Till taste was gone and odour faded !

But now the sun, in pomp of noon,
Look'd blazing o'er the parched plair ;
Alas ! the boy grew languid soon,
And fever thrill'd through all his veins !

The dew forsook his baby brow,
No more with vivid bloom he smiled—
Oh ! where was tranquil Reason now,
To cast her shadow o'er the child ?

Beneath a green and aged palm,
His foot at length for shelter turning,
He saw the nymph reclining calm,
With brow as cool as his was burning !

"Oh ! take me to that bosom cold,"
In murmurs at her feet he said ;
And Reason oped her garment's fold,
And flung it round his fever'd head,

He felt her bosom's icy touch,
And soon it lull'd his pulse to rest ;
For, ah ! the chill was quite too much,
And Love expired on Reason's breast !

IRISH MELODIES.

THE MEETING OF THE WATERS.

THERE is not in the wide world a valley so sweet
As that vale in whose bosom the bright waters meet ; [part,
Oh ! the last rays of feeling and life must deere the bloom of that valley shall fade from my heart.

Yet it was not that nature had shed o'er the scene,
Her purest of crystal and brightest of green ;
'T was not the soft magic of streamlet or hill—
Oh ! no—it was something more exquisite still.

'T was that friends the beloved of my bosom were near,
Who made every dear scene of enchantment
more dear,
And who felt how the best charms of nature improve,
When we see them reflected from looks that we
love,
Sweet vale of Avoca ! how calm could I rest,
In thy bosom of shade, with the friends I love best,
Where the storms that we feel in this cold world
should cease,
And our hearts, like thy waters, be mingled in peace.

BELIEVE ME, IF ALL THOSE ENDEARING YOUNG CHARMS.

AIR.—My Lodging is on the cold Ground.

BELIEVE me, if all those endearing young charms,
Which I gaze on so fondly to-day,
Were to change by to-morrow, and fleet in my arms,
Like fairy-gifts fading away !
Thou wouldst still be adored, as this moment
thou art,
Let thy loveliness fade as it will,
And around the dear ruin, each wish of my heart
Would entwine itself verdantly still !

It is not while beauty and youth are thine own,
And thy cheeks unprofaned by a tear,
That the fervour and faith of a soul can be known,
To which time will but make thee more dear !
Oh ! the heart that has truly loved, never forgets,
But as truly loves on to the close,
As the sun-flower turns on her god, when he sets,
The same look which she turn'd when he rose !

I SAW THY FORM IN YOUTHFUL PRIME.

I saw thy form in youthful prime,
Nor thought that pale decay,
Would steal before the steps of time,
And waste its bloom away. Mary !
Yet still thy features wore that light
Which fleets not with the breath ;
And life ne'er look'd more truly bright
Than in thy smile of death, Mary !

As streams that run o'er golden mines,
 Yet humbly, calmly glide,
 Nor seem to know the wealth that shines
 Within their gentle tide, Mary,
 So, veild beneath the simplest guise,
 Thy radiant genius shone,
 And that which charm'd all other eyes
 Seem'd worthless in thy own, Mary !

If souls could always dwell above,
 Thou ne'er hadst left that sphere ;
 Or, could we keep the souls we love,
 We ne'er had lost thee here, Mary !
 Though many a gifted mind we meet,
 Though fairest forms we see,
 To live with them is far less sweet,
 Than to remember thee, Mary !

SACRED SONGS.

THOU ART, OH GOD !

" The day is thine ; the night also is thine : thou hast prepared the light and the sun.

" Thou hast set all the borders of the earth ; thou hast made summer and winter."—Psalm lxxiv. 16, 17.

THOU art, oh God ! the life and light
 Of all this wondrous world we see ;
 Its glow by day, its smile by night,
 Are but reflections caught from thee.
 Where'er we turn thy glories shine,
 And all things fair and bright are Thine !

When Day, with farewell beam, delays
 Among the opening clouds of Even,
 And we can almost think we gaze
 Through golden vistas into heaven—
 Those hues, that make the sun's decline
 So soft, so radiant, Lord ! are Thine.

When Night, with wings of starry gloom,
 O'ershadows all the earth and skies,
 Like some dark, beauteous bird, whose plume
 Is sparkling with unnumbered eyes—
 That sacred gloom, those fires divine,
 So grand, so countless, Lord ! are Thine.

When youthful Spring around us breathes,
 Thy Spirit warms her fragrant sigh ;
 And every flower the Summer wreathes
 Is born beneath that kindling eye.
 Where'er we turn, thy glories shine,
 And all things fair and bright are Thine !

THIS WORLD IS ALL A FLEETING SHOW.

THIS world is all a fleeting show,
 For man's illusion given ;
 The smiles of Joy, the tears of Woe,
 Deceitful shine, deceitful flow—
 There's nothing true but Heaven !

And false the light on Glory's plume,
 As fading hues of Even ;
 And Love, and Hope, and Beauty's bloom,
 Are blossoms gather'd for the tomb,—
 There's nothing bright but Heaven !

Poor wanderers of a stormy day,
 From wave to wave we're driven,
 And Fancy's flash, and Reason's ray,
 Serve but to light the troubled way—
 There's nothing calm but Heaven !

THE BIRD, LET LOOSE.

THE bird, let loose in eastern skies,
 When hastening fondly home,
 Ne'er stoops to earth her wing, nor flies
 Where idle warblers roam.
 But high she shoots through air and light,
 Above all low delay,
 Where nothing earthly bounds her flight,
 Nor shadow dims her way.

So grant me, God ! from every care
 And stain of passion free,
 Aloft, through virtue's purer air,
 To hold my course to Thee !
 No sin to cloud—no lure to stay
 My soul, as home she springs ;—
 Thy sunshine on her joyful way,
 Thy freedom in her wings !

OH ! THOU WHO DRY'ST THE MOURNER'S TEAR !

" He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds "—Psalm cxlvii. 3.

Oh ! Thou who dry'st the mourner's tear,
 How dark this world would be,
 If, when deceived and wounded here,
 We could not fly to Thee.
 The friends who in our sunshine live,
 When winter comes, are flown ;
 And he who has but tears to give,
 Must weep those tears alone.
 But Thou wilt heal that broken heart,
 Which, like the plants that throw
 Their fragrance from the wounded part,
 Breathes sweetness out of woe.

When joy no longer soothes or cheers,
 And even the hope that threw
 A moment's sparkle o'er our tears,
 Is dimm'd and vanish'd too !
 Oh ! who would bear life's stormy doom,
 Did not thy wing of love
 Come, brightly wafting through the gloom
 Our peace-branch from above ?
 Then sorrow, touch'd by Thee, grows bright
 With more than rapture's ray ;
 As darkness shows us worlds of light
 We never saw by day !

AS DOWN IN THE SUNLESS RETREATS.

As down in the sunless retreats of the ocean,
Sweet flowers are springing no mortal can see,
So, deep in my soul the still prayer of devotion,
Unheard by the world, rises silent to thee,

My God ! silent to thee—

Pure, warm, silent, to thee :

So, deep in my soul the still prayer of devotion,
Unheard by the world, rises silent to thee !

As still to the star of its worship, though cloud-
ed,

The needle points faithfully o'er the dim sea,
So, dark as I roam, in this wintry world shroud-
ed,

The hope of my spirit turns trembling to thee,

My God ! trembling, to thee—

True, fond, trembling, to thee :

So, dark as I roam, in this wintry world shroud-
ed.

The hope of my spirit turns trembling to thee !

LEIGH HUNT.

Born 1784.

THE FEAST OF THE POETS.

T'OTHER day, as Apollo sat pitching his darts
Through the clouds of November, by fits and by starts,

He began to consider how long it had been,
Since the bards of old England a session had seen.

“ I think,” said the god, recollecting, (and then
He fell twiddling a sunbeam, as I may my pen,)

“ I think—let me see—yes, it is, I declare,
As long ago now as that Buckingham there :

And yet I can't see why I've been so remiss,
Unless it may be—and it certainly is,

That since Dryden's fine verses, and Milton's sublime,

I have fairly been sick of their sing-song and rhyme.

There was Collins, 'tis true, had a good deal to say ;

But the dog had no industry,—neither had
Gray :

And Thompson, though dear to my heart, was too florid

To make the world see that their own taste was horrid.

So ever since Pope, my pet bard of the town,
Set a tune with his verses, half up and half
down,

There has been such a doling and sameness—
by Jove,

I'd as soon have gone down to see Kemble in
love.

However, of late as they've rous'd them anew,
I'll e'en go and give them a lesson or two,
And as nothing's done there now-a-days without eating,
See what kind of set I can muster worth treat-
ing."

So saying, the god bade his horses walk for'ard,
And leaving them, took a long dive to the nor'ard :

For Gordon's he made ; and as gods who drop in do,

Came smack on his legs through the drawing-room window.

And here I could tell, where I given to spin
it,

How all the town shook, as the godhead came in it ;

How bright look'd the poets, and brisk blew the airs,

And the laurels shot up in the gardens and squares ;—

But fancies like these, though I've stores to supply me,

I'd better keep back for a poem I've by me,
And merely observe that the girls look'd divine,

And the old folks in-doors exclaimed “ Bless us how fine !”

If you'd fancy, however, what Phœbus might
be,

Imagine a shape above mortal degree,
His limbs the perfection of elegant strength,—
A fine flowing roundness inclining to length,—
A presence that spoke,—an expansion of chest,
(For the god, you'll observe, like his statues was drest.)

His throat like a pillar for smoothness and grace,
His curls in a cluster,—and then such a face,
As marked him at once the true offspring of Jove,

The brow all of wisdom, and lips all of love ;
For though he was blooming, and oval of cheek,
And youth down his shoulders went smoothing
and sleek,

Yet his look with the reach of past ages was
And the soul of eternity thought through his eyes.

I would'nt say more, lest my climax should lose ;

Yet now I have mentioned those lamps of the
I can't but observe what a splendour they shed,
When a thought more than common came into his head :

Then they leaped in their frankness, deliciously
bright,

And shot round about them an arrowy light ;
And if, as he shook back his hair in its cluster,

A curl fell athwart them and darken'd their lustre,

A sprinkle of gold through the duskiness came,
Like the sun through a tree, when he's setting,
in flame.

The god then no sooner had taken a chair,
 And rung for the landlord to order the fare,
 Than he heard a strange noise and a knock from without,—
 And scraping and bowing, came in such a rout !
 There were all the worst play-wrights from Dibdin to Terry,
 All grinning, as who should say, "Shan't we be merry ?"
 With men of light comedy lumb'ring like bears
 up,
 And men of deep tragedy patting their hairs up.
 The god, for an instant, sat fix'd as a stone,
 Till recov'ring, he said in a good-natur'd tone,
 "Oh, the waiters, I see ;—ah, it's all very
 well,—
 Only one of you'll do just to answer the bell."
 But lord ! to see all the great dramatists' faces !
 They look'd at each other, and made such grimaces !
 Then turning about, left the room in vexation,
 And Colman, they say, fairly mutter'd "D——n."

The god fell a laughing to see his mistake,
 But stopp'd with a sigh for poor Comedy's sake ;
 Then gave mine host orders, who bow'd to the floor,
 And had scarcely back'd out, and shut gently
 the door,
 When a hemming was heard, consequential and snapping,
 And a sour little gentleman walk'd with a rap
 in :
 He bow'd, look'd about him, seem'd cold, and sat down,
 And said, "I'm surprised that you'll visit this town : [you,
 To be sure, there are one or two of us who know
 But as for the rest, they are all much below you.
 So stupid, in gen'ral, the natives are grown,
 They really prefer Scotch reviews to their own ;
 So that what with their taste, their reformers,
 and stuff,
 They have sicken'd myself and my friends long enough."
 "Yourself and your friends," cried the god in high glee ;
 "And pray, my frank visitor, who may you
 be ?"
 "Who be ?" cried the other ; "why really—this tone—
 William Gifford's name, I think, pretty well
 known !"
 "Oh—now I remember," said Phœbus ; "ah
 true—
 The Anti-La Cruscan that writes the review :—
 The rod, though 'twas no such vast matter, that fell
 On that plague of the butterflies,—did very
 well ;
 And there's something, which even distaste
 must respect,
 In the self-taught example, that conquer'd neglect :

But not to insist on the recommendations
 Of modesty, wit, and a small stock of patience,
 My visit just now is to poets alone,
 And not to small critics, however well known." ,
 So saying he rang, to leave nothing in doubt,
 And the sour little gentleman bless'd himself
 out.

But glad look'd the god at the next who appear'd.
 For 'twas Campbell, by Poland's pale blessing
 endear'd ;
 And Montgom'ry was with him, a freeman as
 true,
 (Heav'n loves the ideal, which practises too ;)
 And him follow'd Rogers, whose laurel tree shows Thicker leaves, and more sunny, the older it grows ;
 Rejoicing he came in the god-send of weather ;
 Then Scott (for the famous ones all came together) ;
 His host overwhelm'd him with thanks for his novels ;
 Then Crabbe, asking questions concerning Greek hovels ;
 And Byron, with eager indifference ; and Moore
 With admiring glad eyes, that came leaping before ;
 And Keats, with young tresses and thoughts,
 like the god's ;
 And Shelley, a sprite from his farthest abodes :
 Phœbus gave him commissions from Marlowe and Plato ;
 And Landor, whom two Latin poets sent bay to, (Catullus, they tell me, and Ovid ;) and with him
 Came Southey, who rightly thinks court-odes beneath him ;
 And Coleridge, fine dreamer, with lutes in his rhyme ; [time,
 And Wordsworth, the prince of the bards of his

"And now," said the god,—but he scarcely had spoken,
 When bang went the door—you'd have thought it was broken ;
 And in rush'd a mob with a scuffle and squeeze, Exclaiming, "What ! Wordsworth, and fellows like these !"
 Nay then, we may all take our seats as we please !"

I can't, if I would, tell you who they all were ;
 But a whole shoal of fops and of pedants were
 there,
 All the "heart and impart" men*, and such as suppose
 They write like the Virgils, and Popes, and Boileaus ! [fire,
 The god smiled at first with a turn tow'rd's the
 And whisper'd "There, tell'em they'd better retire ;"

* The author, I suppose, alludes to feeble versifiers who deal in hacknied rhymes that seem to suggest equally hacknied images.—COMPILER.

But lord ! this was only to set all their quills up ;
The rogues did but bustle ; and pulling their frills up,
Stood fixing their faces, and stirr'd not an inch Nay, some took their snuff out, and join'd in a pinch.

Then wrath seiz'd Apollo ; and turning again,
" Ye rabble," he cried, " common-minded and
vain,
Whate'er be the faults which true bards may commit,
(And most of 'em lie in your own want of wit,)
Ye shall try, wretched creatures, how well ye can bear
What such only witness, unsmote with despair."

He said : and the place all seem'd swelling with light,
While his locks and his visage grew awfully
bright ;
And clouds, burning inward, roll'd round on each side,
To encircle his state, as he stood in his pride ;
Till at last the full deity put on his rays,
And burst on the sight in the pomp of his blaze !
Then a glory beam'd round, as of fiery rods,
With the sound of deep organs and chorister
gods ;
And the faces of bards, glowing fresh from their skies,
Came thronging about with intentness of eyes,—
And the Nines were all heard, as the harmony swell'd,—
And the spheres, pealing in, the long rapture upheld,—
And all things, above and beneath, and around,
Seem'd a world of bright vision, set floating in sound.

That sight and that music might not be sus-
tain'd,
But by those who in wonder's great school had been train'd ;
And even the bards who had graciousness found,
After gazing awhile, bow'd them down to the ground.
What then could remain for that feeble-eyed crew ?
Through the door in an instant they rush'd and they flew ;
They rush'd, and they dash'd, and they scam-
bled, and stumbled,
And down the hall staircase distractedly tum-bled, [feet,
And never once thought which was head or was
And slid through the hall, and fell plump in the street.
So great was the panic that smote them to flight,
That of all who had come to be feasted that night, [place ;
Not one ventur'd back, or would stay near the Even Croker declin'd, notwithstanding his face.

But Phœbus no sooner had gain'd his good ends.

Than he put off his terrors, and rais'd up his friends,

Who stood for a moment, entranc'd to behold
The glories subside and the dim-rolling gold,
And listen'd to sounds, that with ecstasy burning

Seem'd dying far upward, like heaven returning.

Then " Come," cried the god in his elegant mirth,

" Let us make us a heav'n of our own upon
earth,

And wake with the lips, that we dip in our bowls,
That divinest of music,—congenial souls."

So saying, he led through the door in his state,
Each bard, as he follow'd him, blessing his fate ;
And by some charm or other, as each took his chair,

There burst a most beautiful wreath in his hair.
I can't tell 'em all, but the groundwork was bay,

And Campbell, in his, had some oak-leaves and May ; [vine ;

And Forget-me-not, Rogers ; and Moore had a
And Shelley, besides most magnificent pine,
Had the plant* which thy least touch, Humanity, knows ;

And Keats's had forest-tree, ivy, and rose ;
And Southey some buds of the tall eastern palm ;
And Coleridge mandragoras†, mingled with balm ;
And Wordsworth, with all which the field-walk
endears,

The blossom that counts by its hundreds of years.

Then Apollo put his on, that sparkled with beams,

And rich rose the feast as an epicure's dreams,—
Not an epicure civic, or grossly inclin'd,

But such as a poet might dream ere he din'd ;
For the god had no sooner determin'd the fare,

Than it turn'd to whatever was racy and rare :
The fish and the flesh, for example, were done,

On account of their fineness, in flame from the sun ;

The wines were all nectar of different smack,
To which Muskat was nothing, nor Virginis Lac,

No, nor even Johannisberg, soul of the Rhine,
Nor Montepulciano, though King of all Wine.

Then as for the fruits, you might garden for ages,

Before you could raise me such apples and gages ;
And all on the table no sooner were spread,

Than their cheeks next the god blush'd a beautiful red.

'Twas magic, in short, and deliciousness all ;—
The very men servants grew handsome and tall ;

* The Sensitive Plant.

† There is an allusion to this plant in Shakespeare's Othello and also in his Anthony and Cleopatra. It is observed in a note by Stevens to a passage on the former play that the mandragoras or mandrake has a soporific quality, and that the ancients used it when they wanted an opiate of the most powerful kind.—Compiler.

To velvet-hung ivory the furniture turn'd,
 The service with opal and adamant burn'd;
 Each candlestick chang'd to a pillar of gold,
 While a bundle of beams took the place of the mould;
 The decanters and glasses pure diamond became,
 And the corkscrew ran solidly round into flame:—
 In a word, so completely forestall'd were the wishes,
 E'en harmony struck from the noise of the dishes.

It can't be suppos'd I should think of repeat-
 ing
 The fancies that flow'd at this laureat meeting;
 I haven't the brains, and besides, was not there;
 But the wit may be easily guess'd, by the chair.

I must mention, however, that during the wine,
 Our four great old poets were toasted with nine.
 Then others with six, or with three, as it fitted,
 Nor were those who translate with a gusto,
 omitted.
 At this, Southey begging the deity's ear—
 "I know," interrupted Apollo, "'tis Frere:"
 And Scott put a word in, and begg'd to propose—
 "I'll drink him with pleasure," said Phœbus,
 "'tis Rose."
 Then talking of lyrics, he call'd upon Moore,
 Who sung such a song, that they shouted
 "Encore!"
 And the god was so pleas'd with his taste and his tone,
 He obey'd the next call, and gave one of his own,—
 At which you'd have thought,—('twas so witching a warble,)
 The guests had all turn'd into listening marble;
 The wreaths on their temples grew brighter of
 bloom,
 As the breath of the deity circled the room;
 And the wine in the glasses went rippling in rounds,
 As if follow'd and fann'd by the soft-winged sounds.

Thus chatting and singing they sat till eleven,
 When Phœbus shook hands, and departed for heaven;
 "For poets," he said, "who would cherish
 their powers,
 And hop'd to be deathless, must keep to good hours."
 So off he betook him the way that he came,
 And shot up the north, like an arrow of flame;
 For the Bear was his inn; and the comet, they say,
 Was his tandem in waiting to fetch him away.

The others then parted, all highly delighted;
 And so shall I be, when you find me invited.

TO T. L. H.,

Six years old, during a sickness.

SLEEP breathes at last from out thee,
 My little, patient boy;
 And balmy rest about thee
 Smooths off the day's annoy.
 I sit me down, and think
 Of all thy winning ways;
 Yet almost wish, with sudden shrink,
 That I had less to praise.

Thy sidelong pillow'd meekness,
 Thy thanks to all that aid,
 Thy heart, in pain and weakness,
 Of fancied faults afraid;
 The little trembling hand
 That wipes thy quiet tears,
 These, these are things that may demand
 Dread memories for years.

Sorrows I've had, severe ones,
 I will not think of now;
 And calmly, midst my dear ones,
 Have wasted with dry brow;
 But when thy fingers press
 And pat my stooping head,
 I cannot bear the gentleness,—
 The tears are in their bed.

Ah, first-born of thy mother,
 When life and hope were new,
 Kind playmate of thy brother,
 Thy sister, father too;
 My light, where'er I go,
 My bird, when prison-bound,
 My hand in hand companion,—no,
 My prayers shall hold thee round.

To say "He has departed"—
 "His voice"—"his face"—is gone:
 To feel impatient-hearted,
 Yet feel we must bear on;
 Ah, I could not endure
 To whisper of such woe,
 Unless I felt this sleep ensure
 That it will not be so.

Yes, still he's fixed, and sleeping!
 This silence too the while—
 Its very hush and creeping
 Seem whispering us a smile:
 Something divine and dim
 Seems going by one's ear,
 Like parting wings of Cherubim,
 Who say, "We've finished here."

THE GLOVE AND THE LIONS.

KING Francis was a hearty king, and lov'd a royal sport,
 And one day, as his lions fought, sat looking on the court;

The nobles fill'd the benches round, the ladies
by their side,
And 'mongst them sat the Count de Lorge, with one for whom he sighed ;
And truly 't was a gallant thing to see that crowning show,
Valour and love and a king above, and the royal beasts below.

Ramp'd and roar'd the lions, with horrid laughing jaws ;
They bit, they glared, gave blows like beams,
a wind went with their paws ;
With wallowing might, and stifled roar, they roll'd on one another,
Till all the pit, with sand and mane, was in a thunderous smother ;
The bloody foam above the bars came whizzing
through the air :
Said Francis then, " Faith, gentlemen, we're better here than there."

De Lorge's love o'erheard the king, a beaute-
ous, lively dame,
With smiling lips and sharp bright eyes, that always seemed the same ;
She thought, the Count my lover, is as brave as brave can be,
He surely would do wondrous things to show
his love of me :
King, ladies, lovers, all look on, the occasion is divine,
I'll drop my glove to prove his love ; great glory will be mine.

She dropped her glove, to prove his love, then looked at him and smiled ;
He bowed, and in a moment leap'd among the lions wild :
The leap was quick, return was quick, he has regained the place,
Then threw the glove, but not with love, right in the lady's face.
" By God !" cried Francis, " rightly done," and he rose from where he sat ;
" No love," quoth he, " but vanity, sets love a task like that !"

ABOU BEN ADHEM AND THE ANGEL.

ABOU Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase !)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw, within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
An angel, writing in a book of gold ;
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold :
And to the presence in the room he said,
" What writest thou ?" The vision rais'd its head
And with a look made of all sweet accord, Answered " The names of those who love the Lord."

" And is mine one?" said Abou. " Nay, not so."
Replied the Angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still ; and said, " I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow men."
The angel wrote and vanished. The next night
It came again, with a great wakening light,
And shew'd the names whom love of God had bless'd.
And lo ! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

THE BROKEN HEART OF ANNIE.

Down yon green glen, in yon wee bower,
Lived fair and lovely Annie :
Ere she saw seventeen simmer suns,
She waxed wond'rous bonnie.
Young Lord Dalzell at her bower door
Had privily been calling,
When she grew faint, and sick of heart,
And moanings fill'd her dwelling.

I found her as a lillie flower,
When dew hangs in its blossom,
Wet were her cheeks, and a sweet babe
Hung smiling at her bosom,
Such throbs ran through her frame, as seem'd
Her heart and soul to sever ;
In no one's face she look'd—her bloom
Was fading—and for ever.

Thou hast thy father's smile, my babe,
Maids' eyes to dim with grieving,
His willing glance, which woman's heart-
Could fill with fond believing ;
A voice that made his falsest vows
Seem breathings of pure heaven,
And get, from hearts which he had broke,
His injuries forgiven.

My false love came to me yestreen,
With words all steep'd in honey,
And kiss'd his babe, and said, sweet wean,
Be as thy mother bonnie.
And out he pull'd a purse of gold,
With rings and rubies many—
I look'd at him, but could not speak.
Ye've broke the heart of Annie.

It's not thy gold and silver bright,
Thy words like dropping honey,
Thy silken scarfs, and bodice fine,
And caps all laced an' bonnie,
Can bring me back the peace I've tint*,
Or heal the heart of Annie ;
Speak to thy God of thy broken vows,
For thou hast broken many."

THE LASS OF PRESTON-MILL.

The lark had left the evening cloud,
The dew fell soft, the wind was lowne*,—
Its gentle breath among the flowers
Scarce stirr'd the thistle's top of down ;
The dappled swallow left the pool,
The stars were blinking o'er the hill,
When I met among the hawthorns green
The lovely lass of Preston-mill.

Her naked feet among the grass
Shone like two dewy lilies fair ;
Her brow beam'd white aneath her locks
Black curling o'er her shoulders bare ;
Her cheeks were rich wi' bloomy youth,
Her lips had words and wit at will,
And heaven seem'd looking through her een,
'The lovely lass of Preston-mill.

Quoth I, fair lass, wilt thou gang wi' me,
Where black-cocks crow, and plovers cry ?
Six hills are woolly wi' my sheep,
Six vales are lowing wi' my kye.
I have look'd long for a weel-faured lass,
By Nithsdale's holms, and many a hill—
She hung her head like a dew-bent rose,
'The lovely lass of Preston-mill,

I said, sweet maiden, look nae down,
But gie's a kiss, and come with me :
A lovelier face O ne'er look'd up,—
The tears were dropping frae her ee.
I hae a lad who's far awa',
'That weel could win a woman's will ;
My heart's already full of love,—
Quoth the lovely lass of Preston-mill.

Now who is he could leave sic a lass,
And seek for love in a far countree ?
Her tears dropp'd down like simmer dew ;
I fain had kiss'd them frae her ee.
I took ae kiss o' her comely cheek—
For pity's sake, kind sir, be still ;
My heart is full of other love,
Quoth the lovely lass of Preston-mill.

She streek'd to heaven her twa white hands,
And lifted up her watry ee—
Sae lang's my heart kens aught o' God,
Or light is gladsome to my ee ;
While woods grow green, and burns run clear,
Till my last drop of blood be still,
My heart shall haud nae other love,
Quoth the lovely lass of Preston-mill.

There's comely maids on Dee's wild banks,
And Nith's romantic vale is fu' ;
By Ae and Clouden's hermit streams
Dwells many a gentle dame, I trow.
O ! they are lights of a bonnie kind,
As ever shone on vale and hill,
But there's ae light puts them all out,—
'The lovely lass of Preston-mill.

STANZAS TO A DYING INFANT.

SLEEP, little Baby ! sleep !
Not in thy cradle bed,
Not on thy mother's breast
Henceforth shall be thy rest,
But with the quiet dead.

Yes, with the quiet dead,
Baby ! thy rest shall be—
Oh ! many a weary night,
Weary of life and light,
Would fain lie down with thee.

Flee little tender nursling !
Flee to thy grassy nest—
There the first flowers shall blow,
The first pure flake of snow
Shall fall upon thy breast.

Peace ! peace ! the little bosom
Labours with shortening breath.
Peace ! peace ! that tremulous sigh
Speaks his departure nigh—
Those are the damps of Death.

I've seen thee in thy beauty,
A thing all health and glee ;
But never then, wert thou
So beautiful, as now,
Baby ! thou seem'st to me.

Thine upturn'd eyes glazed over
Like harebells wet with dew—
Already veil'd and hid
By the convulsed lid,
Their pupils darkly blue.

Thy little mouth half open,
The soft lip quivering,
As if like summer air,
Ruffling the rose leaves, there
Thy soul were fluttering.

Mount up, immortal essence !
Young spirit ! hence—depart !
And is this Death ?—Dread Thing !
If such thy visiting
How beautiful thou art !

Oh ! I could gaze for ever
Upon that waxen face,
So passionless ! so pure !
The little shrine was sure
An angel's dwelling place.

Thou weepest, childless mother !
 Ay, weep—'twill ease thine heart—
 He was thy first-born son—
 Thy first, thine only one—
 'Tis hard from him to part.

'Tis hard to lay thy darling
 Deep in the damp cold earth,
 His empty crib to see,
 His silent nursery,
 Late ringing with his mirth.

To meet again in slumber
 His small mouth's rosy kiss,
 Then—waken'd with a start,
 By thine own throbbing heart—
 His twining arms to miss.

And then, to lie and weep,
 And think the live-long night,
 (Feeding thine own distress
 With accurate greediness,)
 Of every past delight.

Of all his winning ways,
 His pretty, playful smiles,
 His joy at sight of thee,
 His tricks, his mimicry,
 And all his little wiles.

Oh ! these are recollections
 Round mothers' hearts that cling ?
 That mingle with the tears
 And smiles of after years,
 With oft awakening.

But thou wilt then, fond mother,
 In after years, look back
 (Time brings such wondrous easing)
 With sadness not unpleasing,
 Even on this gloomy track.

Thou'lt say, " My first-born blessing !
 It almost broke my heart,
 When thou wert forced to go,
 And yet for thee, I know
 'Twas better to depart.

God took thee in his mercy,
 A lamb untask'd—untried—
 He fought the fight for thee—
 He won the victory—
 And thou art sanctified.

I look around and see
 The evil ways of men,
 And oh, beloved child !
 I'm more than reconciled
 To thy departure then.

The little arms that clasped me,
 The innocent lips that prest,
 Would they have been as pure
 Till now, as when of yore
 I lull'd thee on my breast ?

Now, like a dew-drop shrined
 Within a chrystal stone,
 Thou'rt safe in Heaven, my dove !
 Safe with the source of Love,
 The everlasting One !

And when the hour arrives,
 From flesh that sets me free,
 Thy spirit may await,
 The first at Heaven's gate,
 To meet and welcome me."

THE PAUPER'S DEATH-BED.

TREAD softly—bow the head—
 In reverent silence bow—
 No passing bell doth toll,
 Yet an immortal soul
 Is passing now.

Stranger ! however great,
 With lowly reverence bow ;
 There's one in that poor shed—
 One by that paltry bed,
 Greater than thou.

Beneath that Beggar's roof,
 Lo ! Death doth keep his state ;
 Enter—no crowds attend—
 Enter—no guards defend
 This palace gate.

That pavement damp and cold
 No smiling courtiers tread ;
 One silent woman stands
 Lifting with meagre hands
 A dying head.

No mingling voices sound—
 An infant wail alone ;
 A sob suppress'd—again
 That short deep gasp, and then
 The parting groan.

Oh ! change—Oh ! wond'rous change—
 Burst are the prison bars—
 This moment there, so low,
 So agonized, and now
 Beyond the stars !

Oh ! change—stupendous change !
 There lies the soulless clou ;
 The Sun eternal breaks—
 The new Immortal wakes—
 Wakes with his God.

THE SEA.

I REMEMBER a time when existence was young,
When the halo of hope round futurity hung,
When I stoop'd not to commune with sorrow or strife,
But enjoyment alone seem'd the business of life.

The bright sun himself, in an unclouded sky,
Exulted not more in his brightness than I ;
And the clouds that his last rays of light lov'd
to gild,
Could not rival the castles my fancy would build.

The loud-singing bird, and the blythe humming bee,
Were not happier than I, in that season of glee ;
Like the butterfly, flitting round spring's gay-
est bowers,
Fly whither I would, I alighted on flowers.

Yet then, even then, when my young spirit found
Its own heaven within, and above, and around,
There was nothing more dear or delightful to
me,
Than to gaze on the glorious and beautiful sea.

Oh ! I shall not forget, until memory depart,
When first I beheld it, the glow of my heart :
The wonder, the awe, the delight that stole o'er
me,
When its billowy boundlessness open'd before
me !

As I stood on its margin, or roam'd on its strand,
I felt new ideas within me expand,
Of glory and grandeur, unknown till that hour,
And my spirit was mute in the presence of POWER !

But soon, as young boyhood is wont, I o'ercame
The feeling of awe which first master'd my frame,
And that wide world of waters appear'd in my view
A scene of enjoyment unbounded and new.

In the surf-beaten sands that encircl'd it round,
In the billow's retreat, and the breaker's re-
bound,
In its white-drifted form, and its dark-heaving
green,
Each moment 'I gaz'd some fresh beauty was seen.

And thus, while I wander'd on ocean's bleak
shore,
And survey'd its vast surface, and heard its waves roar,
I seem'd wrapt in a dream of romantic delight,
And haunted by majesty, glory, and might !

* * * * *
* * * * *

So it was in the morning of life ! but no more
Can thy grandeur, old Ocean ! such visions restore ;
With the freshness of youth those enchantments
have flown,
But a charm still survives that is proudly thy own.

It is thine to awaken that tenderest thrill
Of pensive enjoyment, which time cannot chill ;
Which survives even love, on its memory to live,
And is dearer by far than all rapture can give.

It is not a feeling of gloom or distress,
But something that language can never express ;
'Tis the essence of joy, and the lux'ry of woe,
The bliss of the blest, faintly imag'd below.

For if ever to mortals sensations are given
As pledges of purer ones hop'd for in heaven,
They are those which arise, when, with humble devotion,
We gaze upon thee, thou magnificent ocean !

Though, while in these houses of clay we must dwell,
We but faintly can guess, and imperfectly tell
What the feelings of fetterless spirits may be ;
They are surely like those which are waken'd
by thee.

A sense of His greatness, whose might, and whose will
First gave thee existence, and governs thee
still ;
By the force of whose " FIAT " thy waters were
made !
By the strength of whose arm thy proud billows are stay'd !

Nor less, when our vision thy vastness would scan,
And our spirits would fain thy immensity span,
Does thy empire, which spreads from equator
to pole,
Prove how feeble and finite is human control.

Yet, mix'd with emotions that humble our pride,
Are others to nature's best feelings allied ;
To the wounded in spirit, the stricken in
heart,
Thy breezes and billows can solace impart.

And this I have found, when, with spirits depreat,
 I have walk'd by thy side as thy waves sank to rest ;
 When the winds which had swept thee were softly subsiding,
 And where breakers had foam'd, rippling
 billows were gliding.

Oh, thus ! have I thought, when the tempests
 that roll,
 And the clouds that o'ershadow and darken my soul,
 Have fulfill'd their commission, my sorrows may cease,
 And my thoughts, like thy waves, find a season
 of peace.

Flow on then, thou type of eternity ! flow :
 In boyhood my heart in thy presence would glow ;
 " For the strength of the happy, the might of the free,
 Seem'd spread like a garment of glory o'er thee."

But more passionless, pensive, and pure is thy way,
 Since dark clouds have shadow'd the noon of my
 day ;
 Oh, then ! like the sun's setting beam on thy wave
 May a ray from Hope's star shed its light on my grave !

TO THE WINDS.

YE viewless Minstrels of the sky !
 I marvel not, in times gone by
 That ye were deified :
 For, even in this later day,
 'T' me oft 'has your power, or play,
 Unearthly thoughts supplied.

Awful your power ! when, by your might
 You heave the wild waves, crested white,
 Like mountains in your wrath ;
 Ploughing between them valleys deep,
 Which, to the seaman rous'd from sleep,
 Yawn like death's opening path !

Graceful your play ! when, round the bower
 Where Beauty culls Spring's loveliest flower,
 To wreath her dark locks there,
 Your gentlest whispers lightly breathe
 The leaves between, fit round that wreath,
 And stir her silken hair.

Still, thoughts like these are but of earth,
 And you can give far loftier birth :—
 Ye come !—we know not whence !
 Ye go !—can mortals trace your flight ?
 All imperceptible to sight ;
 Though audible to sense.

The Sun,—his rise, and set we know ;
 The Sea,—we mark its ebb, and flow ;
 The Moon,—her wax, and wane ;
 The Stars,—Man knows their courses well,
 The Comets' vagrant paths can tell :—
 But you his search disdain.

Ye restless, homeless, shapeless things !
 Who mock all our imaginings,
 Like spirits in a dream ;
 What epithet can words supply
 Unto the bard who takes such high
 Unmanageable theme ?

But one ;—to me, when Fancy stirs
 My thoughts, ye seem HEAVEN'S MESSENGERS,
 Who leave no path untrod ;
 And when, as now, at midnight's hour,
 I hear your voice in all its power,
 It seems the voice of God.

THE PAST.

How wild and dim this life appears !
 One long, deep, heavy sigh !
 When o'er our eyes, half-closed in tears,
 The images of former years
 Are faintly glimmering by !
 And still forgotten while they go,
 As on the sea-beach wave on wave
 Dissolves at once in snow.
 Upon the blue and silent sky
 The amber clouds one moment lie,
 And like a dream are gone !
 Though beautiful the moon-beams play
 On the lake's bosom bright as they,
 And the soul intensely loves their stay,
 Soon as the radiance melts away
 We scarce believe it shone !

Heaven-airs amid the harp-strings dwell,
 And we wish they ne'er may fade—
 They cease ! and the soul is a silent cell,
 Where music never played.
 Dream follows dream through the long night
 hours,
 Each lovelier than the last—
 But ere the breath of morning-flowers,
 That gorgeous world flies past.
 And many a sweet angelic cheek,
 Whose smiles of love and kindness speak,
 Glides by us on this earth—
 While in a day we cannot tell
 Where shone the face we loved so well
 In sadness or in mirth.

THE WIDOWED MOTHER.

BESIDE her babe, who sweetly slept,
A widow'd mother sat and wept
O'er years of love gone by ;
And as the sobs thick-gathering came,
She murmur'd her dead husband's name
'Mid that sad lullaby.

Well might that lullaby be sad,
For not one single friend she had
On this cold-hearted earth ;
The sea will not give back its prey—
And they were wrapt in foreign clay
Who gave the orphan birth.

Stedfastly as a star doth look
Upon a little murmuring brook,
She gazed upon the bosom
And fair brow of her sleeping son—
" O merciful Heaven ! when I am gone
Thine is this earthly blossom !"

While thus she sat—a sunbeam broke
Into the room ;—the babe awoke,
And from his cradle smiled !
Ah me ! what kindling smiles met there,
I know not whether was more fair,
The mother or her child !

With joy fresh-sprung from short alarms,
The smiler stretched his rosy arms,
And to her bosom leapt—
All tears at once were swept away,
And said a face as bright as day,—
" Forgive me ! that I wept !"

Sufferings there are from Nature sprung,
Ear hath not heard, nor Poet's tongue
May venture to declare ;
But this as Holy Writ is sure,
" The griefs she bids us here endure
She can herself repair !"

SONNET.

The Voice of the Mountains.

LIST ! while I tell what forms the mountain's voice !

—The storms are up ; and from yon sable cloud
Down rush the rains ; while 'mid the thunder loud
The viewless eagles in wild screams rejoice.
The echoes answer to the unearthly noise
Of hurling rocks that, plunged into the lake
Send up a sullen groan : from clefts and caves,
As of half-murder'd wretch, hark ! yells awake,
Or red-eyed frenzy as in chains he raves.
These form the mountain's voice ; these, heard
at night,
Distant from human being's known abode,
To earth some spirits bow in cold affright,
But some they lift to glory and to God.

SONNET.

THE lake lay hid in mist, and to the sand
The little billows hastening silently,
Came sparkling on, in many a gladsome band,
Soon as they touch'd the shore, all doom'd to die !

I gazed upon them with a pensive eye,
For on that dim and melancholy strand,
I saw the image of man's destiny.
So hurry we, right onwards, thoughtlessly,
Unto the coast of that eternal land !
Where, like the worthless billows in their glee,
The first faint touch unable to withstand,
We melt at once into eternity.
O Thou, who weigh'st the waters in thine hand
My awe-struck spirit puts her trust in Thee !

THE BELVIDERE APOLLO :

A PRÆ POEM, recited in the Theatre, Oxford, in the year 1812.

HEARD ye the arrow hurtle in the sky ;
Heard ye the dragon monster's deathful cry ?
In settled majesty of calm disdain,
Proud of his might, yet scornful of the slain,
The heav'nly Archer stands—no human birth,
No perishable denizen of earth ;
Youth blooms immortal in his beardless face.
A god in strength, with more than godlike
grace ;
All, all divine—no struggling muscle glows,
Through heaving vein no mantling life-blood flows,
But animate with deity alone,
In deathless glory lives the breathing stone.

Bright kindling with a conqueror's stern delight,
His keen eye tracks the arrow's fateful flight,
Burns his indignant cheek with vengeful fire,
And his lip quivers with insulting ire :
Firm fix'd his tread, yet light, as when on high
He walks th' impalpable and pathless sky :
The rich luxuriance of his hair, confined
In graceful ringlets, wantons on the wind,
That lifts in sport his mantle's drooping fold,
Proud to display that form of faultless mould.

Mighty Ephesian ! with an eagle's flight
Thy proud soul mounted through the fields of light, [abode,
View'd the bright conclave of heaven's blest
And the cold marble leapt to life a god :
Contagious awe through breathless myriads ran,
And nations bow'd before the work of man.
For mild he seem'd, as in Elysian bowers,
Wasting in careless ease the joyous hours ;

Haughty, as bards have sung, with princely sway
Curbing the fierce flame-breathing steeds of
day ;

Beauteous as vision seen in dreamy sleep
By holy maid on Delphi's haunted steep,
'Mid the dim twilight of the laurel grove,
Too fair to worship, too divine to love.

Yet on that form in wild delirious trance
With more than rev'rence gazed the maid of France,

Day after day the love-sick dreamer stood
With him alone, nor thought it solitude !
To cherish grief, her last, her dearest care,
Her one fond hope—to perish of despair.
Oft as the shifting light her sight beguiled,
Blushing she shrunk, and thought the marble,
smiled :

Oft breathless list'ning heard, or seem'd to hear,
A voice of music melt upon her ear.
Slowly she waned, and cold and senseless grown,
Closed her dim eyes, herself benumb'd to stone.
Yet love in death a sickly strength supplied :
Once more she gazed, then feebly smiled and died.

FAITHLESS SALLY BROWN.

An Old Ballad.

Young Ben he was a nice young man,
A carpenter by trade ;
And he fell in love with Saily Brown,
That was a lady's maid.

But as they fetch'd a walk one day,
They met a press-gang crew ;
And Sally she did faint away,
Whilst Ben he was brought to.

The Boatswain swore with wicked words,
Enough to shock a saint,
That though she did seem in a fit,
'Twas nothing but a feint.

"Come, girl," said he, "hold up your head,
He'll be as good as me ;
For when your swain is in our boat,
A boatswain he will be."

So when they'd made their game of her,
And taken off her elf,
She roused, and found she only was
A coming to herself.

5 A

"And is he gone, and is he gone?"
She cried, and wept outright :
"Then I will to the water side,
And see him out of sight."

A waterman came up to her,
"Now, young woman," said he,
"If you weep on so, you will make Eye-water in the sea."

"Alas : they've taken my beau Ben
To sail with old Benbow ;"
And her woe began to run afresh,
As if she'd said Gee woe !

Says he, "they've only taken him
"To the Tender ship, you see ;"
"The Tender-ship," cried Sally Brown,
"What a hard-ship that must be !

"O ! would I were a mermaid now
For then I'd follow him ;
But Oh !—I'm not a fish-woman,
And so I cannot swim.

"Alas ! I was not born beneath
The Virgin and the scales,
So I must curse my cruel stars,
And walk about in Wales."

Now Ben had sail'd to many a place
That's underneath the world ;
But in two years the ship came home,
And all her sails were furl'd.

But when he call'd on Sally Brown,
To see how she went on,
He found she'd got another Ben,
Whose Christian-name was John.

"O Sally Brown, O Sally Brown,
How could you serve me so,
I've met with many a breeze before,
But never such a blow :"

Then reading on his 'bacco box,
He heaved a bitter sigh,
And then began to eye his pipe,
And then to pipe his eye.

And then he tried to sing "All's Well,"
But could not though he tried ;
His head was turn'd, and so he chew'd
His pigtail till he died.

His death, which happen'd in his berth,
At forty-odd befell :
They went and told the sexton, and
The sexton toll'd the bell.

THE OCEAN.

[From Marician Colonna.]

O THOU, vast Ocean! Ever sounding sea!
 Thou symbol of a drear immensity!
 Thou thing that windest round the solid world
 Like a huge animal, which, downward hurl'd
 From the black clouds, lies weltering and alone,
 Lashing and writhing till its strength be gone,
 Thy voice is like the thunder, and thy sleep
 Is as a giant's slumber, loud and deep.
 Thou speakest in the East and in the West
 At once, and on thy heavily laden breast
 Fleets come and go, and shapes that have no
 life

Or motion, yet are moved and met in strife.
 The earth hath nought of this: no chance nor change

Ruffles its surface, and no spirits dare
 Give answer to the tempest-waken air;
 But o'er its wastes the weakly tenants range
 At will, and wound its bosom as they go;
 Ever the same, it hath no ebb, no flow;
 But in their stated rounds the seasons come,
 And pass like visions to their viewless home,
 And come again, and vanish: the young spring
 Looks ever bright with leaves and blossoming,
 And winter always winds his sullen horn,
 When the wild autumn with a look forlorn
 Dies in his stormy manhood; and the skies
 Weep and flowers sicken when the summer flies.
 —Thou only, terrible Ocean, hast a power,
 A will, a voice, and in thy wrathful hour,
 When thou dost lift thine anger to the clouds,
 A fearful and magnificent beauty shrouds,
 Thy broad green forehead. If thy waves be driven

Backwards and forwards by the shifting wind,
 How quickly dost thou thy great strength unbind,
 And stretch thine arms, and war at once with heaven.

Thou trackless and immeasurable main!
 On thee no record ever lived again
 To meet the hand that writ it: line nor lead
 Hath ever fathomed thy profoundest deeps.
 Where haply the huge monster swells and sleeps
 King of his watery limit, who, 'tis said,
 Can move the mighty ocean into storm—
 Oh! wonderful thou art, great element:
 And fearful in thy spleeny humours bent,
 And lovely in repose: thy summer form
 Is beautiful, and when thy silver waves
 Make music in earth's dark and winding caves,
 I love to wander on thy pebbled beach,
 Marking the sunlight at the evening hour,
 And hearken to the thoughts thy waters teach—
 "Eternity, Eternity, and Power."

POESY.

[From the same.]

OH! never shall thy name, sweet Poesy,
 Be flung away, or trampled by the crowd
 As a thing of little worth, while I aloud
 May—(with a feeble voice indeed) proclaim
 The sanctity, the beauty of thy name.
 Thy grateful servant am I, for thy power
 Has solaced me through many a wretched hour;
 In sickness—ay, when frame and spirit sank.
 I turned me to thy crystal cup and drank
 Intoxicating draughts. Faithfullest friend,
 Most faithful—perhaps best: when none were nigh

Unto thy green recesses did I send
 My thoughts, and freshest rills of poesy
 Came streaming all around from fountains old;
 And so I drank and drank, and haply told
 How thankful was I unto the night wind
 Alone,—a cheerless confidant, but kind*.

PORTRAITS.

I DREAMT, and o'er my enchanted vision pass'd
 Shapes of the elder time (beautiful things
 That men have died for!) as they stood on earth,

But more ethereal, and each forehead bore
 The stamp and character of the starry skies.

First came that Roman lady from whose bosom
 The Gracchi twins were born, gracious Cornelia:
 Her raven hair was wreath'd about her brow
 Severe, yet fair and lovely. Like a queen
 She trod, majestic as when Juno throned
 Above the deities, by the side of Jove,
 Lends her proud smile celestial, while her lord
 Showers Heaven's bounties on the world below.
 Behind her follow'd an Athenian dame
 (The pale and elegant Aspasia),
 Like some fair marble carved by Phidias' hand,
 And meant to imitate the nymph or muse:
 Mistress of poetry and song was she,
 And fit to be beloved of Pericles.
 Shadow'd by myrtle boughs she floated onwards.

Then came a dark-brow'd spirit, on whose head
 Laurel and withering roses loosely hung:
 She held a harp amongst whose chords her hand
 Wandered for music—and it came. She sang
 A song despairing, and the whispering winds
 Seem'd envious of her melody, and stream'd
 Amidst the wires to rival her, in vain.
 Short was the strain, but sweet. Methought it spoke

* Not poets only, but their readers also, have often acknowledged the magic of sweet verse in the hour of sorrow. Sir James Mackintosh in one of his interesting diaries remarks—"In all vexations which are not great, I successfully apply to poetry for consolation:—

Ever against eating cares
 Lap me in soft Lydian airs."

And on another occasion, when depressed by sickness, he tells us that he "soothed himself by five books of Paradise Lost."— Compiler.

Of broken hearts, and still and moonlight seas,
Of love, and loneliness, and fancy gone,
And hopes decay'd for ever: and my ear
Caught well remember'd names, "Leucadia's rock"

At times, and "Faithless Phaon:" then the form
Pass'd not, but seem'd to melt in air away:
This was the Lesbian Sappho.—Then pass'd by Another, and another, without names.
At last came one whom none could e'er mistake
Amidst a million: Egypt's dark-eyed Queen:
The love, the spell, the bane of Antony.
O, Cleopatra! who shall speak of thee?
Gaily, but like the empress of a land
She moved, and light as a wood-nymph in her
prime,
And crown'd with costly gems, whose single price
Might buy a kingdom, yet how dim they shone
Beneath the magic of her eye, whose beam
Flash'd love and languishment! Of varying humours
She seem'd, yet subtle in her wildest mood,
As guile were to her passions ministrant.
At last she sank as dead. A noxious worm Fed on those blue and wandering veins that laced
Her rising bosom: aye, did sleep upon
The pillow of Antony, and left behind,
In dark requital for its banquet—death.

A LONDON LYRIC.

(Without.)

THE winds are bitter; the skies are wild;
From the roof comes plunging the drowning
rain:
Without,—in tatters, the world's poor child
Sobbed aloud her grief, her pain!
No one heareth her, no one heedeth her;
But Hunger, her friend, with his cold gaunt
hand,
Grasps her throat,—whispering huskily,
'What dost Thou in a Christian land?'

(Within.)

The skies are wild, and the blast is cold:
Yet Riot and Luxury brawl within:
Slaves are waiting, in crimson and gold,—
Waiting the nod of a child of sin.
The fire is crackling, wine is bubbling
Up in each glass to its beaded brim;
The jesters are laughing, the parasites quaffing
'Happiness,'—'honour,'—and all for him!

(Without.)

She who is slain 'neath the winter weather,—
Ah! she once had a village fame,
Listened to love on the moon lit heather,
Had gentleness—vanity—maiden shame:
Now her allies are the tempest howling,
Prodigal's curses—self-disdain,
Poverty,—misery;—Well, no matter,
There is an end unto every pain

5 A 2

The harlot's fame was her doom to-day,
Disdain,—despair; by to-morrow's light
The ragged boards and the pauper's pall;
And so she'll be given to dusty night.
Without a tear or a human sigh,
She's gone,—poor life and its 'fever' o'er,
So,—let her in calm oblivion lie;
While the world runs merry as heretofore!

(Within.)

He who yon lordly feast enjoyeth,
He who doth rest on his couch of down.
He it was, who threw the forsaken
Under the feet of the trampling town:
Liar—betrayer—false as cruel,—
What is the doom for his dastard sin?
His peers, they scorn?—high dames, they shun
him?
—Unbar yon palace, and gaze within.

There,—yet his deeds are all trumpet-sounded,
There, upon silken seats recline
Maidens as fair as the summer morning,
Watching him rise from the sparkling wine.
Mothers all proffer their stainless daughters,
Men of high honour salute him 'friend';
Skies! oh, where are your cleansing waters?
World! oh, where do thy wonders end?

[Date of birth uncertain.]

THE DEATH OF LEONIDAS.

It was the wild midnight,—
A storm was on the sky;
The lightning gave its light,
And the thunder echoed by.

The torrent swept the glen,
The ocean lash'd the shore;
Then rose the Spartan men,
To make their bed in gore!

Swift from the deluged ground
Three hundred took the shield;
Then, silent, gather'd round
The Leader of the field.

He spoke no warrior-word,
He bade no trumpet blow;
But the signal-thunder roar'd,
And they rush'd upon the foe.

The fiery element
Show'd, with one mighty gleam,
Rampart, and flag, and tent,
Like the spectres of a dream.

All up the mountain side,
All down the woody vale,
All by the rolling tide
Waved the Persian banners pale.

And King Leonidas,
Among the slumbering band,
Sprang foremost from the pass,
Like the lightning's living brand.

Then double darkness fell,
And the forest ceased its moan :
But there came a clash of steel,
And a distant, dying groan.

Anon, a trumpet blew,
And a fiery sheet burst high,
That o'er the midnight threw
A blood-red canopy.

A host glared on the hill ;
A host glared by the bay ;
But the Greeks rush'd onwards still,
Like leopards in their play.

The air was all a yell,
And the earth was all a flame,
Where the Spartan's bloody steel
On the silken turbans came.

And still the Greek rush'd on
Beneath the fiery fold,
Till, like a rising sun,
Shone Xerxes' tent of gold.

They found a royal feast,
His midnight banquet, there !
And the treasures of the East
Lay beneath the Doric spear.

Then sat to the repast
The bravest of the brave !
That feast must be their last,
That spot must be their grave.

They pledged old Sparta's name
In cups of Syrian wine,
And the warrior's deathless fame
Was sung in strains divine.

They took the rose-wreath'd lyres
From eunuch and from slave,
And taught the languid wires
The sounds that Freedom gave.

But now the morning star
Crown'd Æta's twilight brow ;
And the Persian horn of war
From the hills began to blow.

Up rose the glorious rank,
'To Greece one cup pour'd high,—
Then, hand in hand, they drank
"To Immortality !"

Fear on King Xerxes fell,
When, like spirits from the tomb,
With shout and trumpet-knell,
He saw the warriors come.

But down swept all his power,
With chariot and with charge ;
Down pour'd the arrowy shower,
Till sank the Dorian's targe.

They march'd within the tent,
With all their strength unstrung ;
To Greece one look they sent,
Then on high their torches flung.

To heaven the blaze uproll'd,
Like a mighty altar-fire ;
And the Persians' gems and gold
Were the Grecians' funeral pyre.

Their king sat on the throne,
His captains by his side,
While the flame rush'd roaring on,
And their pæan loud replied !

Thus fought the Greek of old !
Thus will he fight again !
Shall not the self-same mould
Bring forth the self-same men ?

THERMOPYLÆ.

Shout for the mighty men
Who died along this shore—
Who died within this mountain glen !
For never nobler chieftain's head
Was laid on Valour's crimson bed,
Nor ever prouder gore
Sprang forth, than theirs who won the day
Upon thy strand, Thermopylæ !

Shout for the mighty men,
Who on the Persian tents,
Like lions from their midnight den,
Bounding on the slumbering deer,
Rush'd— a storm of sword and spear ;—
Like the roused elements,
Let loose from an immortal hand,
To chasten or to crush a land !

But there are none to hear ;
Greece is a hopeless slave.
LEONIDAS ! no hand is near
To lift thy fiery falchion now ;
No warrior makes the warrior's vow
Upon thy sea-wash'd grave.
The voice that should be raised by men,
Must now be given by wave and glen.

And it is given !—the surge—
The tree—the rock—the sand—
On Freedom's kneeling spirit urge,
In sounds that speak but to the free,

The memory of thine and thee !

The vision of thy band
Still gleams within the glorious dell,
Where their gore hallow'd, as it fell !

And is thy grandeur done ?

Mother of men like these !

Has not thy outcry gone,
Where Justice has an ear to hear ?—
Be holy ! God shall guide thy spear ;

Till in thy crimson'd seas,
Are plunged the chain and scimitar,
GREECE shall be a new-born Star !

DOMESTIC LOVE.

DOMESTIC Love ! not in proud palace halls
Is often seen thy beauty to abide ;
Thy dwelling is in lowly cottage walls,
That in the thickets of the woodbine hide ;
With hum of bees around, and from the side
Of woody hills some little bubbling spring,
Shining along through banks with harebells
dyed ;

And many a bird to warble on the wing,
When Morn her saffron robe o'er heaven and earth doth fling.

O ! Love of loves !—to thy white hand is given
Of earthly happiness the golden key !

Thine are the joyous hours of winter's even,
When the babes cling around their father's knee .

And thine the voice, that on the midnight sea
Melts the rude mariner with thoughts of home,
Peopling the gloom with all he longs to see.

Spirit ! I've built a shrine ; and thou hast come,
And on its altar closed—for ever closed thy plume !

AN ESTUARY.

A calm Evening.

Look on these waters, with how soft a kiss
They woo the pebbled shore ! then steal away,
Like wanton lovers,—but to come again,
And die in music !—There, the bending skies
See all their stars,—and the beach-loving trees,
Osiers and willows, and the watery flowers,
That wreath their pale roots round the ancient stones,
Make pictures of themselves !

DETACHED PASSAGES

From "Cataline," a dramatic poem.

Effects of Oratory.

His words seem'd oracles,
That pierced their bosoms ; and each man would turn,

And gaze in wonder on his neighbour's face,
That with the like dumb wonder answer'd him :
Then some would weep, some shout ; some, deeper touch'd,

Keep down the cry with motion of their hands,
In fear but to have lost a syllable.

The evening came, yet there the people stood,
As if 'twere noon, and they the marble sea,
Sleeping, without a wave. You could have heard
The beating of your pulses while he spoke,—
But, when he ceased, the shout was like the roar
Of Ocean in the storm.

Counterfeited Joy.

HE seem'd to feel

The fiercest joy of all ; pledged Heaven and Earth

In brimming goblets ; talk'd a round of things,
Lofty and rambling as an ecstasy :
Laugh'd, till his very laughter check'd our mirth,
And all gazed on him ; then, as if surprised,
Marking the silence, mutter'd some excuse,
And sank in reverie ; then, wild again,
Talk'd, drank, and laugh'd—the first of Bac-chanals.

MRS. MACLEAN*.

Born 1807†.

ELENORE.

[From the Troubadour.]

THE lady sits in her lone bower,
With cheek wan as the white rose-flower
That blooms beside, 'tis pale and wet
As that rose with its dew pearls set.
Her cheek burns with a redder dye,
Flashes light from her tearful eye ;
She has heard pinions beat the air,
She sees her white dove floating there ;
And well she knows its faithful wing
The treasure of her heart will bring ;
And takes the gentle bird its stand
Accustom'd on the maiden's hand,
With glancing eye and throbbing breast,
As if rejoicing in its rest.

She read the scroll,—dear love, to-night
By the lake, all is there for flight
What time the moon is down ;—oh, then
My own life shall we meet again !
One upward look of thankfulness,
One pause of joy, one fond caress
Of her soft lips, as to reward
The messenger of Eginhard.

That night in her proud father's hall
She shone the fairest one of all ;
For like the cloud of evening came
Over her cheek the sudden flame,
And varying as each moment brought
Some hasty change of secret thought ;

* Better known by the triple initials (L. E. L.) of her maiden name, Letitia Elizabeth Landon.

† Mrs. Maclean died in the latter end of 1838, and intelligence of her death reached India just before this sheet was prepared for the press.

As if its colour would confess
 The conscious heart's inmost recess.
 And the clear depths of her dark eye
 Were bright with troubled brilliancy,
 Yet the lids droop'd as with the tear
 Which might oppress but not appear.
 And flatteries, and smile and sigh
 Loaded the air as she past by.
 It sparkled, but her jewell'd vest
 Was crost above a troubled breast:
 Her curls, with all their sunny glow,
 Were braided o'er an aching brow ;
 But well she knew how many sought
 To gaze upon her secret thought ;—
 And Love is proud,—she might not brook
 That others on her heart should look.
 But there she sate, cold, pale, and high,
 Beneath her purple canopy ;
 And there was many a mutter'd word,
 And one low whisper'd name was heard,—

The name of Eginhard,—that name
 Like some forbidden secret came,
 The theme went, that he dared to love
 One like a star his state above ;
 Here to the princess turn'd each eye,—
 And it was said, he did not sigh
 With love that pales the pining cheek,
 And leaves the slighted heart to break.
 And then a varying tale was told,
 How a page had betray'd for gold ;
 But all was rumour light and vain,
 That all might hear, but none explain.

Like one that seeks a festival,
 Early the princess left the hall ;
 Yet said she, sleep dwelt on her eyes,
 That she was worn with revelries.
 And hastily her maidens' care
 Unbinds the jewels from her hair.
 Odours are round her chamber strown,
 And Elenore is left alone.

With throbbing heart, whose pulses beat
 Louder than fall her ivory feet,
 She rises from her couch of down ;
 And, hurriedly, a robe is thrown
 Around her form, and her own hand
 Lets down her tresses' golden band.
 Another moment she has shred
 Those graceful tresses from her head.
 There stands a plate of polish'd steel,
 She folds her cloak as to conceal
 Her strange attire, for she is drest
 As a young page in dark green vest.
 Softly she steps the balustrade,
 Where myrtle, rose, and hyacinth made
 A passage to the garden-shade.

It was a lovely summer-night,
 The air was incense-fill'd, the light
 Was dim and tremulous, a gleam,
 When a star, mirror'd on the stream,

Sent a ray round just to reveal
 How gales from flower to flower steal.
 " It was on such a night as this,
 When even a single breath is bliss,
 Such a soft air, such a mild heaven,
 My vows to Eginhard were given."
 Sigh'd Elenore : " Oh, might it be
 A hope, a happy augury !"

She reach'd the lake,—a blush, a smile,
 Contended on her face the while ;
 And safely in a little cove,
 Shelter'd by willow-trees above,
 An ambuscade from all secured,
 Her lover's little boat lay moor'd.—
 One greeting word, with muffled oar,
 And silent lip, they left that shore.

It was most like a phantom-dream
 To see that boat flit o'er the stream,
 So still, that but yet less and less
 It grew, it had seem'd motionless.
 And then the silent lake, the trees
 Visible only when the breeze
 Aside the shadowy branches threw,
 And let one single star shine through,—
 While the faint glimmer scarcely gave
 To view the wanderers of the wave.

The breeze has borne the clouds away
 That veil'd the blushes of young day :
 The lark has sung his morning-song ;—
 Surely the princess slumbers long.
 And now it is the accustom'd hour
 Her royal father seeks her bower,
 When her soft voice and gentle lute.
 The snowfall of her fairy-foot,
 The flowers she has cull'd, with dew
 Yet moist upon each rainbow-hue,
 The fruits with bloom upon their cheek,
 Fresh as the morning's first sun-streak ;
 Each, all conspired to while away
 The weariness of royal sway.

But she is gone : there hangs her lute,
 And there it may hang lone and mute :
 The flowers may fade, for who is there
 To triumph now if they are fair ?
 There are her gems,—oh, let them twine
 An offering round some sainted shrine !
 For she who wore them may not wear
 Again those jewels in her hair.

At first the monarch's rage was wild ;
 But soon the image of his child
 In tenderness rose on his heart,
 How could he bear from it to part ?
 And anger turn'd to grief : in vain
 Ambition had destroy'd the chain
 With which love had bound happiness.
 In vain remorse, in vain redress,—

Fruitless all search. And years past o'er,
No tidings came of Elenore,
Although the king would have laid down
His golden sceptre, purple crown,
His pomp, his power, but to have prest
His child one moment to his breast.

And where was Elenore? her home
Was now beneath the forest-dome;—
A hundred knights had watch'd her hall,
Her guards were now the pine-trees tall:
For harps waked with the minstrel-tale,
Sang to her sleep the nightingale:
For silver vases, where were blent
Rich perfumes from Arabia sent,
Where odours when the wild thyme-flower
Wafted its sweets on gale and shower.
For carpets of the purple loom
The violets spread their cloud of bloom,
Starr'd with primroses; and around
Boughs like green tapestry swept the ground.
—And there they dwelt apart from all
That gilds and mocks ambition's thrall;
Apart from cities, crowds, and care,
Hopes that deceive, and toils that wear;
For they had made themselves a world
Like that ere ever man was hurl'd
From his sweet Eden, to begin
His bitter course of grief and sin.—
And they were happy; Eginhard
Had won the prize for which he dared
Dungeon and death; but what is there
That the young lover will not dare?
And she, though nurtured as a flower,
The favourite bud of a spring-bower,
Daughter of palaces, yet made
Her dwelling place in the green shade;
Happy, as she remember'd not
Her royal in her peasant lot,—
With gentle cares, and smiling eyes
As love could feel no sacrifice.
Happy her ivory brow to lave
Without a mirror but the wave,
As one whose sweetness could dispense
With all save its own excellence;—
A fair but gentle creature, meant
For heart, and hearth, and home content.

It was at night the chase was over,
And Elenore sat by her lover,—
Her lover still, though years had fled
Since their first word of love was said,—
When one sought, at that darksome hour,
The refuge of their lonely bower,
A hunter, who, amid the shade,
Had from his own companions stray'd.
And Elenore gazed on his face,
And knew her father! In the chase
Often the royal mourner sought
A refuge from his one sad thought.
He knew her not,—the lowly mien,
The simple garb of forest-green,
The darken'd brow, which told the spoil
The sun stole from her daily toil,

The cheek where woodland health had shed
The freshness of its morning-red,—
All was so changed. She spread the board,
Her hand the sparkling wine-cup pour'd;
And then around the hearth they drew,
And cheerfully the woodfire threw
Its light around.—Bent o'er her wheel
Scarcely dared Elenore to steal
A look, half tenderness, half fear,
Yet seem'd he as he loved to hear
Her voice, as if it had a tone
Breathing of days and feelings gone.

Ah! surely, thought she, Heaven has sent
My father here, as that it meant
Our years of absence ended now!
She gazed upon his soften'd brow;
And the next moment, all revealing,
Elenore at his feet is kneeling!—
Need I relate that, reconciled,
The father bless'd his truant child.

THE PILGRIM'S SONG.

I HAVE gone east, I have gone west,
To seek for what I cannot find:
A heart at peace with its own thoughts,
A quiet and contented mind.
I have sought high, I have sought low,
Alike my search has been in vain;
The same lip mix'd the smile and sigh,
The same hour mingled joy and pain.
And first I sought 'mid sceptred kings;
Power was, so peace might be with them:
They cast a look of weariness
Upon the care-lined diadem.
I ask'd the soldier; and he spoke
Of a dear quiet home afar,
And whisper'd of the vanity,
The ruin, and the wrong of war.
I saw the merchant 'mid his wealth;
Peace surely would with plenty be:
But no! his thoughts were all abroad
With their frail ventures on the sea.
I heard a lute's soft music float
In summer-sweetness on the air;
But the poet's brow was worn and wan,—
I saw peace was not written there.
And then I number'd o'er the ills,
That wait upon our mortal scene;
No marvel peace was not with them,
The marvel were if it had been.
First, childhood comes with all to learn,
And, even more than all, to bear
Restraint, reproof, and punishment,
And pleasures seen but not to share.
Youth, like the Scripture's madman, next,
Scattering around the burning coal;
With hasty deeds and misused gifts,
That leave their ashes on the soul.
Then manhood wearied, wasteg'd, worn,
With hopes destroy'd and feelings dead;

And worldly caution, worldly wants,
Coldness, and carelessness instead.
Then age at last, dark, sullen, drear,
The breaking of a worn-out wave;
Letting us know that life has been
But the rough passage to the grave.
Thus we go on; hopes change to fears
Like fairy-gold that turns to clay,
And pleasure darkens into pain,
And time is measured by decay.
First our fresh feelings are our wealth,
They pass and leave a void behind;
Then comes ambition, with its wars,
That stir but to pollute the mind.
We loathe the present, and we dread
To think on what to come may be;
We look back on the past, and trace
A thousand wrecks, a troubled sea.
I have been over many lands,
And each and all I found the same;
Hope in its borrow'd plumes, and care
Madden'd and mask'd in pleasure's name.

A LOVE SPELL.

WHERE, oh! where 's the chain to fling,
One that will bind Cupid's wing,
One that will have longer power
Than the April sun or shower?
Form it not of Eastern gold,
All too weighty it to hold;
Form it neither all of bloom,
Never does Love find a tomb
Sudden, soon, as when he meets
Death amid unchanging sweets:
But if you would fling a chain,
And not fling it all in vain,
Like a fairy form a spell
Of all that is changeable:
Take the purple tints that deck,
Meteor-like, the peacock's neck;
Take the many hues that play
On the rainbow's colour'd way;
Never let a hope appear
Without its companion fear;
Only smile to sigh, and then
Change into a smile again;
Be to-day as sad, as pale,
As minstrel with his lovelorn tale;
But to-morrow gay as all -
Life had been one festival.
If a woman would secure,
All that makes her reign endure,
And, alas! her reign must be Ever most in phantasy,
Never let an envious eye
Gaze upon the heart too nigh;
Never let the veil be thrown
Quite aside, as all were known
Of delight and tenderness,
In the spirit's last recess;
And, one spell all' spells above,
Never let her own her love.

MARIANA.

"Mariana in the moated grange."—Measure for Measure.

WITH blackest moss the flowerplots
Were thickly crusted, one and all,
The rusted nails fell from the knots
That held the peach to the gardenwall.
The broken sheds looked sad and strange,
Unlifted was the clinking latch,
Weeded and worn the ancient thatch
Upon the lonely moated grange.
She only said "My life is dreary,
He cometh not," she said;
She said "I am aweary, aweary;
I would that I were dead!"

II.

Her tears fell with the dews at even,
Her tears fell ere the dews were dried,
She could not look on the sweet heaven,
Either at morn or eventide.
After the flitting of the bats,
When thickest dark did trance the sky,
She drew her casement-curtain by,
And glanced athwart the glooming flats.
She only said "The night is dreary,
He cometh not," she said;
She said "I am aweary, aweary,
I would that I were dead!"

III.

Upon the middle of the night,
Waking she heard the nightfowl crow:
The cock sung out an hour ere light:
From the dark fen the oxen's low
Came to her: without hope of change,
In sleep she seemed to walk forlorn,
Till cold winds woke the grey-eyed morn
About the lonely moated grange.
She only said, "The day is dreary,
He cometh not," she said;
She said, "I am aweary, aweary,
I would that I were dead!"

IV.

About a stonecast from the wall,
A sluice with blackened waters slept,
And o'er it many, round and small,
The clustered marishmosses crept.
Hard by a poplar shook alway,
All silvergreen with gnarled bark,
For leagues no other tree did dark
The level waste, the rounding grey.
She only said, "My life is dreary,
He cometh not," she said;
She said, "I am aweary, aweary,
I would that I were dead!"

V.

And ever when the moon was low,
And the shrill winds were up an' away,
In the white curtain, to and fro,
She saw the gusty shadow away.

But when the moon was very low,
 And wild winds bound within their cell,
 The shadow of the poplar fell
 Upon her bed, across her brow,
 She only said, "The night is dreary,
 He cometh not," she said ;
 She said, "I am weary, weary,
 I would that I were dead !"

VI.

All day within the dreamy house,
 The doors upon their hinges creaked,
 The blue fly sung i' the pane ; the mouse
 Behind the mouldering wainscot shrieked,
 Or from the crevice peered about.
 Old faces glimmered through the doors,
 Old footsteps trod the upper floors,
 Old voices called her from without.
 She only said, "My life is dreary,
 He cometh not," she said ;
 She said, "I am weary, weary,
 I would that I were dead !"

VII.

The sparrow's chirrup on the roof,
 The slow clock ticking, and the sound
 Which to the wooing wind aloof
 The poplar made, did all confound
 Her sense ; but most she loathed the hour
 When the thickmoted sunbeam lay
 Athwart the chambers, and the day
 Downsloped was westering in his bower.
 Then, said she, "I am very dreary,
 He will not come," she said ;
 She wept, "I am weary, weary,
 Oh God, that I were dead !"

(Late Tennyson.)

[Date of birth uncertain.]

THE ocean at the bidding of the moon
 For ever changes with his resolute tide ;
 Flung shoreward now, to be regather'd soon
 With kingly pauses of reluctant pride
 And semblance of return :—Anon from home
 He issues forth anew, high ridg'd and free—
 The gentlest murmur of his seething foam
 Like armies whispering where great echoes be !
 O leave me here upon this beach to rove,
 Mute listener to that sound so grand and lone—
 A glorious sound, deep drawn and strongly
 Thrown,
 And reaching those on mountain heights above,
 To British ears, (as who shall scorn to own ?)
 A tutelard fond voice, a saviour-tone of love !

* This gentleman is the younger brother of Alfred Tennyson, but why he has changed his name I cannot say.—Compiler.

INTELLECT AND PASSION.

VEXATION waits on passion's changeable glow,
 But th' intellect may rove a thousand ways
 And yet be calm while fluctuating so :
 The dew-drop shakes not to its shifting rays,
 And transits of soft light—be bold to choose
 This never-satiate freedom of delight
 Before the fiery bowl and red carouse.
 And task for joy thy soul's majestic might :
 So for the sensual will be rarer need,
 So will thy mind a giant force assume,
 Strong as the centre of the deep Maelstrom
 When flung into the calm of sightless speed :
 So wilt thou scorn on lowlier aims to feed,
 And go in glory to a sage's tomb !

THE PRESS.

God said, "Let there be light !"
 Grim darkness felt his might,
 And fled away ;
 Then, startled seas ; and mountains cold
 Shone forth, all bright in blue and gold,
 And cried, "'Tis day ! 'tis day !"
 "Hail holy light !" exclaimed
 The thund'rous cloud, that flamed
 O'er daisies white ;
 And, lo, the rose, in crimson dressed,
 Leaned sweetly on the lily's breast,
 And blushing, murmured, "Light !"
 Then was the skylark born ;
 Then rose the embattled corn ;
 Then floods of praise
 Flowed o'er the sunny hills of noon ;
 And then in stillest night, the moon
 Poured forth her pensive lays.
 Lo, heaven's bright bow is glad !
 Lo, trees and flowers, all clad
 In glory, bloom !
 And shall the mortal sons of God,
 Be senseless as the trodden clod,
 And darker than the tomb ?
 No ; by the mind of man !
 By the swart artisan !
 By God, our sire !
 Our souls have holy light within,
 And every form of grief and sin
 Shall see and feel its fire.
 By earth, and hell, and heaven,
 The shroud of souls is riven ;
 Mind, mind alone,
 Is light, and hope, and life, and power !
 Earth's deepest night, from this bless'd hour,
 The night of minds, is gone !
 "The Press !" all lands shall sing ;
 The Press, the Press we bring,
 All lands to bless :
 Oh, pallid want ! oh, labor stark !
 Behold, we bring the second ark !
 The Press ! the Press ! the Press !

TRUE LOVE.

By Robert Green.

Born 1550.—Died 1592.

SITTING by a river's side,
Where a silent stream did glide,
Muse I did of many things
That the mind in quiet brings.
I 'gan think how some men deem
Gold their God ; and some esteem
Honour is the chief content
That to men in life is lent.
And some others do contend,
Quiet none like to a friend.
Others hold, there is no wealth
Compared to a perfect health.
Some man's mind in quiet stands
When he is lord of many lands.
But I did sigh, and said, all this
Was but a shade of perfect bliss :
And in my thoughts I did approve
Nought so sweet as is true love.
Love 'twixt lovers passeth these,
When mouth kisseth, and heart 'grees :
With arms folded, and lips meeting,
Each soul another sweetly greeting !
For by the breath the soul fleeteth,
And soul with soul in kissing meeteth.
If love be so sweet a thing
That such happy bliss doth bring,
Happy is love's sugar'd thrall ;
But unhappy maidens all,
Who esteem your virgin blisses
Sweeter than a wife's sweet kisses.
No such quiet to the mind
As true love, with kisses kind.
But, if a kiss prove unchaste,
Then is true love quite disgrac'd.
Though love be sweet, learn this of me,
No love sweet but honesty !

THE PASSIONATE SHEPHERD TO HIS LOVE.

By Christopher Marlowe.

Born 1562.—Died 1592.

COME live with me, and be my love,
And we will all the pleasures prove
That hills and vallies, dale and field,
And all the craggy mountains yield.

There will we sit upon the rocks,
And see the shepherds feed their flocks.
By shallow rivers, to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

There will I make thee beds of roses
With a thousand fragrant posies,
A cap of flowers, and a kirtle
Imbrodered all with leaves of mirtle ;

A gown made of the finest wool,
Which from our pretty lambs we pull ;
Slippers lin'd choicely from the cold ;
With buckles of the purest gold ;

A belt of straw, and ivie buds,
With coral claps, and amber studs ;
And if these pleasures may thee move,
Then live with me, and be my love.

The shepherd swains shall dance and sing
For thy delight each May morning :
If these delights thy mind may move,
Then live with me, and be my love.

THE NYMPH'S REPLY.

By Sir Walter Raleigh.

Born 1558.—Died 1618.

IF that the world and love were young,
And truth in every shepherd's tounge,
These pretty pleasures might me move
To live with thee, and be thy love.

But time drives flocks from field to fold,
When rivers rage, and rocks grow cold,
And Philomel becometh dumb,
And all complain of cares to come.

The flowers do fade, and wanton fields
To wayward winter reckoning yield ;
A honey tongue, a heart of gall,
Is fancy's spring, but sorrow's fall.

Thy gowns, thy shoes, thy beds of roses,
Thy cap, thy kirtle, and thy posies,
Soon break, soon wither, soon forgotten,
In folly ripe, in reason rotten.

Thy belt of straw, and ivie buds,
Thy coral clasps, and amber studs ;
All these in me no means can move
To come to thee, and be thy love.

But could youth last, and love still breed,
Had joyes no date, nor age no need ;
Then those delights my mind might move
To live with thee, and be thy love.

TIME GOES BY TURNS.

By Robert Southwell.Born 1560.—Died 1595.

THE lopped tree in time may grow again,
 Most naked plants renew both fruit and flower;
 The sorriest wight may find release of pain,
 The driest soil suck in some moistening shower:
 Time goes by turns, and chances change by
 course,
 From foul to fair, from better hap to worse.

The sea of Fortune doth not ever flow;
 She draws her favours to the lowest ebb:
 Her tides have equal times to come and go;
 Her loom doth weave the fine and coarsest
 web:

No joy so great but runneth to an end,
 No hap so hard but may in fine amend.

Not always fall of leaf, nor ever spring,
 Not endless night, yet not eternal day:
 The saddest birds a season find to sing,
 The roughest storm a calm may soon allay,
 Thus, with succeeding turns, God tempereth
 all,
 That man may hope to rise, yet fear to fall.

A chance may win that by mischance was lost;
 That net that holds no great, takes little fish;

In some things all, in all things none are cross'd;
 Few all they need, but none have all they wish.

Unmingled joys here to no man befall:
 Who least, hath some; who most, hath never
 all.

CUPID AND CAMPASPE.

By John Lilje.Born 1553.—Died 1600.

CUPID and my Campaspe playd
 At cardes for kisses; Cupid payd:
 He stakes his quiver, bow and arrows,
 His mother's doves, and teame of sparrows;
 Loses them too; then down he throws
 The coral of his lippe, the rose
 Growing on's cheek (but none knows how);
 With these, the crystal of his browe,
 And then the dimple of his chinne!
 All these did my Campaspe winne.
 At last he set her both his eyes,
 She won, and Cupid blind did rise,
 O Love! has she done this to thee?
 What shall, alas! become of mee?

THE SOUL'S ERRAND.

By Joshua Silvester.Born 1563.—Died 1618.

Goe, soule, the body's guest,
 Upon a thankelesse arrant;
 Feare not to touche the best,
 The truth shall be thy warrant:
 Goe, since I needs must dye,
 And give the world the lye.

Goe tell the court, it glowes
 And shines like rotten wood:
 Goe tell the church it shoves
 What's good, and doth no good:
 If church and court reply,
 Then give them both the lye.

Tell potentates they live
 Acting by other's actions;
 Not lov'd unless they give,
 Not strong but by their factions;
 If potentates reply,
 Give potentates the lye.

Tell men of high condition,
 That rule affairs of state,
 Their purpose is ambition,
 Their practise onely hate;
 And if they once reply,
 Then give them all the lye.

Tell them that brave it most,
 They beg for more by spending,
 Who in their greatest cost
 Seek nothing but commending;
 And if they make reply,
 Spare not to give the lye.

Tell zeale, it lacks devotion;
 Tell love, it is but lust;
 Tell time, it is but motion;
 Tell flesh, it is but dust;
 And wish them not reply,
 For thou must give the lye.

Tell age, it daily wasteth;
 Tell honour, how it alters;
 Tell beauty, how she blasteth;
 Tell favour, how she falters;
 And as they shall reply,
 Give each of them the lye.

Tell wit, how much it wrangles
 In tickle points of nicenesse;
 Tell wisdom, she entangles
 Herselfe in over-wisenesse;
 And if they do reply,
 Straight give them both the lye.

Tell physicke of her boldnesse ;
 Tell skill, it is pretension ;
 Tell charity of coldness ;
 Tell law, it is contention ;
 And as they yield reply,
 So give them still the lye.

Tell fortune of her blindnesse ;
 Tell nature of decay ;
 Tell friendship of unkindnesse ;
 Tell justice of delay :
 And if they dare reply,
 Then give them all the lye.

Tell arts, they have no soundnesse,
 But vary by esteeming ;
 Tell schooles, they want profoundnesse ;
 And stand too much on seeming :
 If arts and schooles reply,
 Give arts and schooles the lye.

Tell faith, it's fled the citie ;
 Tell how the countrey erreth ;
 Tell, manhood shakes off pitie ;
 Tell, vertue least preferreth :
 And, if they doe reply,
 Spare not to give the lye.

So, when thou hast, as I
 Commanded thee, done blabbing,
 Although to give the lye
 Deserves no less than stabbing,
 Yet stab at thee who will,
 No stab the soule can kill.

PHILLIDA AND CORYDON.

By Nicolas Breton.

Born 1555.—Died 1624.

In the merry month of May,
 In a morn by break of day,
 Forth I walk'd by the wood side,
 When as May was in his pride :
 There I spied, all alone,
 Phillida and Corydon.
 Much ado there was, God wot,
 He would love, and she would not :
 She said, never man was true ;
 He said, none was false to you.
 He said, he had lov'd her long ;
 She said, love should have no wrong,
 Corydon would kiss her then ;
 She said, maids must kiss no men,
 Till they did for good and all :
 Then she made the shepherd call
 All the heavens to witness truth,
 Never lov'd a truer youth.
 Then with many a pretty oath,
 Yea and nay, and faith and troth,
 Such as silly shepherds use
 When they will not love abuse ;

Love, which had been long deluded,
 Was with kisses sweet concluded ;
 And Phillida with garlands gay
 Was made the lady of the May.

THE SHEPHERD'S SONG.

By Thomas Heywood.

Born 1580.—Died 16—.

We that have known no greater state
 Than this we live in, praise our fate :
 For, courtly silks in cares are spent,
 When country's russet breeds content.
 The power of sceptres we admire,
 But sheep-hook for our use desire.
 Simple and low is our condition,
 For here with us is no ambition ;
 We with the sun our flocks unfold,
 Whose rising makes their fleeces gold.
 Our music from the birds we borrow,
 They bidding us, we them, good-morrow.

Our habits are but coarse and plain,
 Yet they defend from wind and rain ;
 As warm too, in an equal eye,
 As those be stained in scarlet dye.
 Those that have plenty wear, we see,
 But one at once, and so do we.
 The shepherd with his home-spun lass
 As many merry hours doth pass
 As courtiers with their costly girls,
 Though richly deck'd in gold and pearls ;
 And, though but plain, to purpose woo,
 Nay, oft-times, with less danger too.
 Those that delight in dainties store
 One stomach feed at once, no more :
 And, when with homely fare we feast,
 With us it doth as well digest ;
 And many times we better speed,
 For our wild fruits no surfeits breed.
 If we sometimes the willow wear,
 By subtle swains that dare forswear,
 We wonder whence it comes, and fear
 They've been at court, and learnt it there.

MY MIND TO ME A KINGDOM IS.

By William Byrd.

Born 1543.—Died 1623.

My minde to me a kingdome is ;
 Such perfect joy therein I finde
 As farre exceeds all earthly blisse,
 That God or Nature hath assignde ;
 Though much I want, that most would have,
 Yet still my mind forbids to crave.

Content I live, this is my stay ;
 I seek no more than may suffice ;
 I presse to beare no haughtie sway ;
 Look what I lack my mind supplies.
 Loe! thus I triumph like a king,
 Content with that my mind doth bring.

I see how plentie surfets oft,
 And hastie clymbers soonest fall :
 I see that such as sit aloft
 Mishap doth threaten most of all :
 These get with toile and keep with feare :
 Such cares my mind could never beare.

No princely pompe, nor welthie store,
 No force to winne the vactorie,
 No wylie wit to salve a sore,
 No shape to winne a lover's eye ;
 To none of these I yeeld as thrall,
 For why, my mind despiseth all.

Some have too much, yet still they crave,
 I little have, yet seek no more :
 They are but poore, tho' much they have ;
 And I am rich with little store :
 They poor, I rich ; they beg, I give ;
 They lacke, I lend ; they pine, I live.

I laugh not at another's losse,
 I erudge not at another's gaine ;
 No worldly wave my mind can tosse
 I brooke that is another's bane :
 I feare no foe nor fawne on friend ;
 I lothe not life, nor dread mine end.

I joy not in no earthly blisse ;
 I weigh not Crœsus' welth a straw ;
 For care, I care not what it is ;
 I ferre not fortune's fattall law :
 My mind is such as may not move
 For beautie bright or force of love.

I wish but what I have at will ;
 I wander not to seeke for more ;
 I like the plaine, I climme no hill ;
 In greatest stormes I sitte on shore,
 And laugh at them that toile in vaine
 To get what must be lost againe.

I kisse not where I wish to kill ;
 I feigne not love where most I hate ;
 I breake no sleep to winne my will ;
 I wayte not at the mighties gate ;
 I scorne no poore, I feare no rich ;
 I feele no want, nor have too much.

The court, ne cart, I like, ne loath ;
 Extreames are counted worst of all :
 The golden meane betwixt them both
 Doth surest sit, and fears no fall :
 This is my choyce, for why I finde,
 No wealth is like a quiet minde.

My welth is health, and perfect ease ;
 My conscience clere my chiefe defence :
 I never seeke by brybes to please,
 Nor by desert to give offence :
 Thus do I live, thus will I die ;
 Would all did so as well as I !

TO MY SON, VINCENT CORBET.

By Bishop Corbet.

Born 1582.—Died 1635.

WHAT I shall leave thee none can tell,
 But all shall say I wish thee well :
 I wish thee Vin before all wealth,
 Both bodily and ghostly health ;
 Nor too much wealth, nor wit come to thee,
 So much of either may undo thee.
 I wish thee learning, not for show,
 Enough for to instruct, and know ;
 Not such as gentleman require
 To prate at table, or at fire.
 I wish thee all thy mother's graces,
 Thy father's fortunes, and his places.
 I wish thee friends, and one at court
 Not to build on, but support ;
 To keep thee, not in doing many Oppressions, but from suffering any.
 I wish thee peace in all thy ways,
 Nor lazy nor contentious days ;
 And when thy soul and body part,
 As innocent as now thou art.

THE SHORTNESS OF LIFE.

By Philip Quarles.

Born 1592.—Died 1644.

My glass is half unspent ? forbear t' arrest
 My thriftless day too soon : my poor request
 Is that my glass may run but out the rest.

My time-devouring minutes will be done
 Without thy help ; see ! see how swift they run ;
 Cut not my thread before my thread be spun.

The gain's not great I purchase by this stay ;
 What loss sustain'st thou by so small delay,
 To whom ten thousand years are but a day ?

My following eye can hardly make a shift
 To count my winged hours ; they fly so swift,
 They scarce deserve the bounteous name of gift.

The secret wheels of hurrying time do give
 So short a warning, and so fast they drive,
 That I am dead before I seem to live.

And what's a life ? a weary pilgrimage,
 Whose glory in one day doth fill the stage
 With childhood, manhood, and decrepit age.

And what's a life ? the flourishing array
 Of the proud summer-meadow, which to-day
 Wears her green plush, and is to-morrow hay.

Read on this dial, how the shades devour
 My short-lived winter's day ! hour eats up
 hour ;
 Alas ! the total's but from eight to four.

Behold these lillies, which thy hands have made
Fair copies of my life, and open laid
To view, how soon they droop, how soon they fade!

Shade not that dial, night will blind too soon ;
My non-aged day already points to noon ;
How simple is my suit ! how small my boon !

Nor do I beg this slender inch, to wile
The time away, or falsely to beguile
My thoughts with joy ; here's nothing worth a smile.

LOVE.

By Phineas Fletcher.

Born 1584.—Died 1650.

Love's sooner felt than seen ; his substance thin
Betwixt those snowy mounts in ambush lies ;
Oft in the eyes he spreads his subtle gin ;
He therefore soonest wins that fastest flies.
Fly thence, my dear, fly fast, my Thomalin !
Who him encounters once, for ever dies.
But if he lurk between the ruddy lips,
Unhappy soul, that thence his nectar sips.
While down into his heart the sugar'd poison slips !

Oft in a voice he creeps down through the ear ;
Oft from a blushing cheek he lights his fire ;
Oft shrouds his golden flame in likest hair ;
Oft in a soft smooth skin doth close retire ;
Oft in a smile ; oft in a silent tear :
And if all fail, yet Virtue's self he'll hire.
Himself's a dart, when nothing else can
move :

Who then the captive soul can well reprove,
When Love and Virtue's self become the darts of Love.

DEATH'S FINAL CONQUEST.

By James Shirley.

Born 1594.—Died 1666.

THE glories of our birth and state
Are shadows, not substantial things ;
There is no armour against fate :
Death lays his icy hands on kings :
Scepter and crown
Must tumble down,

And in the dust be equal made
With the poor crooked scythe and spade.

Some men with swords may reap the field,
And plant fresh laurels where they kill !
But their strong nerves at last must yield ;
They tame but one another still.
Early or late
They stoop to fate,
And must give up their murmuring breath,
When they pale captives creep to death.

The garlands wither on your brow,
Then boast no more your mighty deeds ;
Upon death's purple altar now
See where the victor victim bleeds ;
All heads must come
To the cold tomb,
Only the actions of the just
Smell sweet and blossom in the dust.

DEATH.

By Henry Delaune.

Born 1611.—Died —.

WHEN the straight columns, on whose well-knit chine

Some stately structure leans its weighty head,
Are from their centre mov'd, or made incline,
The pile soon sinks, and shrinks to its first bed :

So, when you see Death's agents daily come,
And from the earth just men and good translate,
A sure and sad prognostic 'tis of some
Impending judgment on a realm or state.

Ere God on Sodom stretch'd his flaming hand,
He had a care to send just Lot away ;
So mostly still, when he will scourge a land,
Whom he best loves he puts out of the way.

Early set forth to your eternal race ;
Th' ascent is steep and craggy you must climb :

God, at all times, has promis'd sinners grace
If they repent ; but he ne'er promis'd time.

Cheat not yourselves, as most : who then prepare
For death, when life is almost turn'd to fume ;
One thief was sav'd that no man might despair ;
And but one thief, that no man might presume.

Wealth, honour, friends, wife, children, kindred, all

We so much doat on, and wherein we trust,
Are withering gourds ; blossoms that fade and
fall ;

Landscapes in water ; and deeds drawn in dust.

* * * * *

How many has the morn beheld to rise
In their youth's prime, as glorious as the sun,
Who, like a flower cropt, have had their eyes
Clos'd up by Death before the day was done !

Poison, a knife, a pistol, thousands more
Sad instruments, set periods to our fates.
Nature lets in to life but at one door ;
But, to go forth, Death opens many gates.

OLD ENGLISH BALLADS.

CHEVY CHACE*.

God prosper long our noble king,
Our lives and safeties all ;
A woefull hunting once there did
In Chevy-Chace befall ;

To drive the deere with hound and horne,
Erle Percy took his way,
The child may rue that is unborne,
The hunting of that day.

The stout Erle of Northumberland
A vow to God did make,
His pleasure in the Scottish woods
Three summer days to take ;

The cheefest harts in Chevy-Chace
To kill and beare away,
These tydings to Erle Douglas came,
In Scotland where he lay :

Who sent Erle Percy present word,
He wold prevent his sport.
The English erle, not fearing that,
Did to the woods resort

With fifteen hundred bow-men hold ;
All chosen men of might,
Who knew full well in time of neede
To ayme their shafts aright.

The gallant greyhounds swiftly ran,
To chase the fallow deere :
On munday they began to hunt,
Ere day-light did appeare ;

And long before high noone they had
An hundred fat buckes slaine ;
Then having dined, the drovyers went
To rouze the deare againe.

The bow-men mustered on the hills,
Well able to endure ;
And theire backs all, with speciall care,
That day were guarded sure.

* The old song of Chevy-Chace is the favourite ballad of the common people of England, and Ben Jonson used to say, he had rather have been the author of it than of all his works. Sir Philip Sidney, in his discourse of Poetry, speaks of it in the following words : ' I never heard the old song of Percy and Douglas, that I found not my heart more moved than with a trumpet ; and yet it is sung by some blind crowder with no rougher voice than rude style, which being so evil apperelled in the dust and cobweb of that uncivil age, what would it work trimmed in the gorgeous eloquence of Pindar ?'—Spectator, No. 70.

† This ballad was old in Sidney's day, but the present version is a somewhat modernized one, but is said to be not much later than Queen Elizabeth's time.—Compiler.

The hounds ran swiftly through the woods,
The nimble deere to take.
That with their cries the hills and dales
An eccho shrill did make.

Lord Percy to the quarry went,
To view the slaughter'd deere ;
Quoth he, Erle Douglas promised
This day to meet me heere :

But if I thought he wold not come,
Noe longer wold I stay.
With that, a brave younge gentleman
Thus to the Erle did say :

Loe, yonder doth Erle Douglas come,
His men in armour bright ;
Full twenty hundred Scottish speres
All marching in our sight ;

All men of pleasant Tivydale,
Fast by the river Tweede :
O cease your sports, Erle Percy said,
And take your bowes with speede :

And now with me, my countrymen,
Your courage forth advance ;
For there was never champion yett,
In Scotland nor in France,

That ever did on horsebacke come,
But if my hap it were,
I durst encounter man for man,
With him to break a spere.

Erle Douglas on his milke-white steede,
Most like a baron bolde,
Rode foremost of his company,
Whose armour shone like gold.

Show me, sayd hee, whose men you bee,
That hunt soe boldly heere.
That, without my consent, doe chase
And kill my fallow-deere.

The first man that did answer make,
Was noble Percy hee,
Who sayd, Wee list not to declare,
Nor shew whose men wee bee :

Yet wee will spend our deere blood,
Thy cheefest harts to slay.
Then Douglas swore a solempne oathe,
And thus in rage did say,

Ere thus I will out-braved bee,
One of us two shall dye :
I know thee well, an erle thou art ;
Lord Percy, soe am I.

But trust me, Percy, pittye it were,
And great offence to kill
Any of these our guiltlesse men,
For they have done no ill.

Let thou and I the battell trye,
And set our men aside.
Accurst bee he, Erle Percy sayd,
By whome this is denyed.

Then stept a gallant squier forth,
Witherington was his name,
Who said, I wold not have it told
To Henry our king for shame,

That ere my captaine fought on foote,
And I stood looking on.
You be two erles, sayd Witherington,
And I a squier alone :

Ile doe the best that doe I may,
While I have power to stand :
While I have power to weeld my sword
Ile fight with hart and hand.

Our English archers bent their bowes,
Their harts were good and trew ;
Att the first flight of arrowes sent,
Full four-score Scots they slew.

They closed full fast on every side,
Noe slacknes there was found ;
And many a gallant gentleman
Lay gasping on the ground.

O Christ ! it was a grieve to see,
And likewise for to heare,
The cries of men lying in their gore,
And scattered here and there.

At last these two stout erles did meet,
Like captaines of great might :
Like Lyons wood, they layd on lode,
And made a cruell fight :

They fought untill they both did sweat,
With swords of tempered steele ;
Untill the blood, like drops of rain,
They tricklin downe did feelee.

Yeeld thee, Lord Percy, Douglas sayd ;
In faith I will thee bringe,
Where thou shalt high advanced bee
By James our Scottish king :

Thy ransome I will freely give,
And this report of thee,
Thou art the most couragious knight,
That ever I did see.

Noe, Douglas, quoth Erle Percy then,
Thy proffer I doe scorne ;
I will not yeelde to any Scott,
That ever yett was borne.

With that, there came an arrow keene
Out of an English bow,
Which struck Erle Douglas to the heart,
A deepe and deadlye blow :

Who never spake more words than these,
Fight on, my merry men all ;
For why, my life is at an end ;
Lord Percy sees my fall.

Then leaving liffe, Erle Percy tooke
The dead man by the hand ;
And said, Erle Douglas, for thy life
Wold I had lost my land.

O Christ ! my verry hart doth bleed
With sorrow for thy sake ;
For sure, a more redoubted knight
Mischance cold never take.

A knight amongst the Scotts there was
Which saw Erle Douglas dye,
Who streight in wrath did vow revenge
Upon the Lord Percy :

Sir Hugh Mountgomery was he call'd,
Who, with a spere most bright,
Well-mounted on a gallant steed,
Ran fiercely through the fight ;

And past the English archers all,
Without all dread or feare ;
And through Earl Percyes body then
He thrust his hatefull spere ;

With such a vehement force and might
He did his body gore,
The staff ran through the other side
A large cloth-yard, and more.

So thus did both these nobles dye,
Whose courage none could staine :
An English archer then perceiv'd
The noble erle was slaine ;

He had a bow bent in his hand,
Made of a trusty tree ;
An arrow of a cloth-yard long
Up to the head drew hee ;

Against Sir Hugh Mountgomerye,
So right the shaft he sett,
The grey goose-winge that was thereon,
In his harts bloode was wett.

This fight did last from breake of day,
Till setting of the sun ;
For when they rung the evening-bell,
The battel scarce was done.

With stout Erle Percy, there was slaine
Sir John of Egerton,
Sir Robert Ratcliff, and Sir John,
Sir James that bold barron :

And with Sir George and stout Sir James,
Both knights of good account,
Good Sir Ralph Raby there was slaine,
Whose prowess did surmount.

For Witherington needs must I wayle,
As one in doleful dumpes* ;
For when his leggs were smitten off,
He fought upon his stumpes.

And with Erle Douglas, there was slaine
Sir Hugh Mountgomerye,
Sir Charles Murray, that from the feeld
One foote wold never flee.

Sir Charles Murray, of Ratcliff, too,
His sisters sonne was hee ;
Sir David Lamb, so well esteem'd,
Yet saved cold not bee.

And the Lord Maxwell in like case
Did with Erle Douglas dye :
Of twenty hundred Scottish speres,
Scarce fifty-five did flye.

Of fifteen hundred Englishmen,
Went home but fifty-three ;
The rest were slaine in Chevy-Chace,
Under the greene woode tree.

Next day did many widowes come,
Their husbands to bewaile ;
They washt their wounds in brinish teares,
But all wold not prevayle.

Theyr bodies, bathed in purple gore,
They bare with them away ;
They kist them dead a thousand times,
Ere they were cladd in clay.

The news was brought to Eddenborrow,
Where Scottlands king did raigne,
That brave Erle Douglas suddenlye
Was with an arrow slaine :

O heavy newes, King James did say,
Scotland may wnesse bee,
I have not any captaine more
Of such account as hee.

Like tydings to King Henry came,
Within as short a space,
That Percy of Northumberland
Was slaine in Chevy-Chace :

Now God be with him, said our king,
Sith it will noe better bee ;
I trust I have, within my realme,
Five hundred as good as hee :

Yett shall not Scotts nor Scotland say,
But I will vengeance take :
I'll be revenged on them all,
For brave Erle Percyes sake.

* i. e. " I, as one in deep concern, must lament."

This vow full well the king perform'd
After, at Humbledowne ;
In one day, fifty knights were slayne,
With Lords of great renowe :

And of the rest, of small account,
Did many thousands dye :
Thus endeth the hunting of Chevy-Chase,
Made by the Erle Percy.

God save our king, and bless this land
With plenty, joy, and peace ;
And grant henceforth, that foule debate
"Twixt noblemen may cease.

THE CHILDREN OF THE WOOD.

Now ponder well, you parents deare,
These wordes which I shall write ;
A doleful story you shall heare,
In time brought forth to light.
A gentleman of good account
In Norfolke dwelt of late,
Who did in honour far surmount
Most men of his estate.

Sore sicke he was, and like to dye,
No helpe his life could save ;
His wife by him as sicke did lye,
And both possesse one grave.
No love between these two was lost,
Each was to other kinde.
In love they liv'd, in love they dyed,
And left two babes behinde :

The one a fine and prettye boy,
Not passing three years olde ;
The other a girl more young than he,
And fram'd in beautyes molde.
The father left his little son,
As plainlye doth appeare,
When he to perfect age should come,
Three hundred poundes a yeare.

And to his little daughter Jane
Five hundred poundes in gold,
To be paid downe on marriage-day,
Which might not be controll'd :
But if the children chance to dye,
Ere they to age should come,
Their uncle should possesse their wealth ;
For so the wille did run.

Now, brother, said the dying man,
Look to my children deare ;
Be good unto my boy and girl,
No friendes else have they here :
To God and you I recommend
My children deare this daye ;
But little while be sure we have
Within this world to staye.

You must be father and mother both,
 And uncle all in one ;
 God knowes what will become of them,
 When I am dead and gone.
 With that bespake their mother deare,
 O brother kinde, quoth shee,
 You are the man must bring our babes
 To wealth or miserie :

And if you keep them carefully,
 Then God will you reward ;
 But if you otherwise should deal,
 God will your deedes regard.
 With lippes as cold as any stone,
 They kist their children small :
 God bless you both, my children deare ;
 With that the teares did fall.

These speeches then their brother spake
 To this sick couple there,
 The keeping of your little ones
 Sweet sister, do not feare :
 God never prosper me nor mine,
 Nor aught else that I have,
 If I do wrong your children deare,
 When you are layd in grave.

The parents being dead and gone,
 The children home he takes,
 And brings them strait unto his house,
 Where much of them he makes.
 He had not kept these pretty babes
 A twelvemonth and a daye.
 But, for their wealth, he did devise
 To make them both awaye.

He bargain'd with two ruffians strong,
 Which were of furious mood,
 That they should take these children young
 And slaye them in a wood.
 He told his wife an artful tale,
 He would the children send
 To be brought up in faire London,
 With one that was his friend.

Away then went those pretty babes,
 Rejoycing at that tide,
 Rejoycing with a merry minde,
 They should on cock-horse ride.
 They prate and prattle pleasantly,
 As they rode on the waye,
 To those that should their butchers be,
 And work their lives decaye :

So that the pretty speech they had,
 Made Murder's heart relent ;
 And they that undertooke the deed,
 Full sore did now repent.
 Yet one of them more hard of heart,
 Did vowe to do his charge,
 Because the wretch, that hired him,
 Had paid him very large.

The other won't agree thereto,
 So here they fall to strife ;
 With one another they did fight
 About the childrens life :

And he that was of mildest mood,
 Did slaye the other there,
 Within an unfrequented wood ;
 The babes did quake for feare !

He took the children by the hand,
 Teares standing in their eye,
 And bad them straitwaye follow him,
 And looke they did not crye :
 And two long miles he ledd them on,
 While they for food complaine :
 Staye here, quoth he. I'll bring you bread,
 When I come back againe.

These pretty babes, with hand in hand,
 Went wandering up and downe ;
 But never more could see the man
 Approaching from the town :
 Their prettye lippes with black-berries,
 Were all besmear'd and dyed,
 And when they sawe the darksome night,
 They sat them downe and cryed.

Thus wandered these poore innocents.
 Till deathe did end their grief,
 In one anothers armes they dyed,
 As wanting due relief :
 No burial ' this ' pretty ' pair '
 Of any man receives,
 Till Robin-red-breast piously
 Did cover them with leaves.

And now the heavy wrathe of God
 Upon their uncle fell ;
 Yea, fearfull fiends did haunt his house,
 His conscience felt an hell :
 His barnes were fir'd, his goodes consum'd,
 His landes were barren made,
 His cattle dyed within the field,
 And nothing with him stayd.

And in a voyage to Portugal
 Two of his sonnes did dye ;
 And to conclude, himselfe was brought
 To want and miserie :
 He pawn'd and mortgaged all his land
 Ere seven yeares came about.
 And now at length this wicked act
 Did by this meanes come out :

The fellowe that did take in hand
 These children for to kill,
 Was for a robbery judg'd to dye,
 Such was God's blessed will :
 Who did confess the very truth,
 As here hath been display'd :
 Their uncle having dyed in gaol,
 Where he for debt was layd.

You that executors be made,
 And overseers eke
 Of children that be fatherless,
 And infants mild and meek ;
 Take you example by this thing,
 And yield to each his right,
 Lest God with such like miserye
 Your wicked minds requite.

OSSIAN. CALTHON AND COLMAL.

ARGUMENT.

This piece, as many more of Ossian's compositions, is addressed to one of the first Christian missionaries. The story of the poem is handed down, by tradition, thus: In the country of the Britons between the walls, two chiefs lived in the days of Fingal, Duntharmo, lord of Teutha, supposed to be the Tweed; and Rathmor, who dwelt at Clutha, well known to be the river Clyde. Rathmor was not more renowned for his generosity and hospitality, than Duntharmo was infamous for his cruelty and ambition. Duntharmo, through envy, or on account of some private feud, which subsisted between the families, murdered Rathmor at a feast; but being afterwards touched with remorse, he educated the two sons of Rathmor, Calthon and Colmal, in his own house. They growing up to man's estate, dropped some hints that they intended to revenge the death of their father, upon which Duntharmo shut them up in two caves, on the banks of Teutha, intending to take them off privately. Colmal, the daughter of Duntharmo, who was secretly in love with Calthon, helped him to make his escape from prison, and fled with him to Fingal, disguised in the habit of a young warrior, and implored his aid against Duntharmo. Fingal sent Ossian with three hundred men to Colmal's relief, Duntharmo having previously murdered Colmar, came to a battle with Ossian; but he was killed by that hero, and his army totally defeated.

Calthon married Colmal, his deliverer; and Ossian returned to Morven.

PLEASANT is the voice of thy song, thou lonely dweller of the rock! It comes on the sound of the stream, along the narrow vale. My soul awakes, O stranger! in the midst of my hall I stretch my hand to the spear, as in the days of other year. I stretch my hand, but it is feeble, and the sigh of my bosom grows. Wilt thou not listen, son of the rock! to the song of Ossian? My soul is full of other times: the joy of my youth returns. Thus the sun appears in the west, after the steps of his brightness have moved behind a storm: the green hills lift their dowy heads: the blue streams rejoice in the vale. The aged hero comes forth on his staff, his grey hair glitters in the beam. Wilt thou not behold, son of the rock, a shield in Ossian's hall? It is marked with the strokes of battle; and the brightness of its bosses has faded. That shield the great Duntharmo bore, the chief of streamy Teutha, Duntharmo bore it in battle, before he fell by Ossian's spear. Listen, son of the rock! to the tale of other years.

Rathmor was a chief of Clutha. The feeble dwelt in his hall. The gates of Rathmor were never shut; his feast was always spread. The sons of the stranger came. They blessed the generous chief of Clutha. Bards raised the song, and touched the harp: joy brightened on the face of the sad! Duntharmo came, in his pride, and rushed into the combat of Rathmor. The chief of Clutha overcame; the rage of Duntharmo rose. He came, by night, with his warriors; the mighty Rathmor fell. He fell in his halls, where his feast was often spread for strangers.

Colmar and Calthon were young, the sons of car-borne Rathmor. They came, in the joy of youth, into their father's hall. They beheld him in his blood; their bursting tears descend. The soul of Duntharmo melted, when he saw the children of youth. He brought them to Alteutha's walls; they grew in the house of their foe. They bent the bow in his presence; and came forth to his wars. They saw the fallen walls of their fathers: they saw the green thorn in the hall. Their tears rushed forth in secret. At times their faces were sad. Duntharmo beheld their grief: his darkening soul designed their death. He closed them in two caves, on the echoing banks of Teutha. The sun did not come there with his beams; nor the moon of heaven by night. The sons of Rathmor remained in darkness, and foresaw their death.

The daughter of Duntharmo wept in silence, the fair-haired, blue-eyed Colmal. Her eye had rolled in secret on Calthon: his loveliness swelled in her soul. She trembled for her warrior; but what could Colmal do? Her arm could not lift the spear; nor was the sword formed for her side. Her white breast never rose beneath a mail. Neither was her eye the terror of heroes. What canst thou do, O Colmal! for the falling chief? Her steps are unequal; her hair is loose; her eye looks wildly through her tears. She came, by night, to the hall. She armed her lovely form in steel, the steel of a young warrior, who fell in the first of his battles. She came to the cave of Calthon, and loosed the thong from his hands.

"Arise, son of Rathmor," she said, "arise; the night is dark! Let us fly to the king of Selma, chief of fallen Clutha; I am the son of Lamgal, who dwelt in thy father's hall. I heard of thy dark dwelling in the cave, and my soul arose. Arise, son of Rathmor! arise, the night is dark!"—"Blest voice!" replied the chief, "comest thou from the clouds to Calthon? The ghosts of his fathers have often descended in his dreams, since the sun has retired from his eyes, and darkness has dwelt around him. Or art thou the son of Lamgal, the chief I often saw in Clutha? But shall I fly to Fingal, and Colmar my brother low? Will I fly to Morven, and the hero closed in night? No; give me that spear, son of Lamgal; Calthon will defend his brother!"

"A thousand warriors," replied the maid, "stretch their spears round car-borne Colmar. What can Calthon do against a host so great? Let us fly to the king of Morven, he will come with war. His arm is stretched forth to the unhappy: the lightning of his sword is round the weak. Arise, thou son of Rathmor; the shadows will fly away. Arise, or thy steps may be seen, and thou must fall in youth.

The sighing hero rose; his tears descend for car-borne Colmar. He came with the maid to Selma's hall; but he knew not that it was Colmal. The helmet covered her lovely face. Her bosom heaved beneath the steel. Fingal returned from the chase, and found the lovely strangers. They were like two beams of light in the midst of the hall of shells. The king heard the tale of grief; and turned his eyes around. A thousand heroes half-rose before him; claiming the war of Teutha. I came with my spear from the hill; the joy of battle rose in my breast: for the king spoke to Ossian in the midst of a thousand chiefs.

"Son of my strength," began the king, "take thou the spear of Fingal. Go to Teutha's rushing stream, and save the car-borne Colmar. Let thy fame return before thee like a pleasant gale; that my soul may rejoice over my son, who renews the renown of our fathers. O-sian! be thou a storm in war; but mild when the foe is low. It was thus my fame arose. O my son! be thou like Selma's chief. When the haughty come to my halls, my eyes behold them not. But my arm is stretched forth to the unhappy. My sword defends the weak."

I rejoiced in the words of the king. I took my rattling arms. Diaran rose at my side, and Dargo, king of spears. Three hundred youths followed our steps; the lovely strangers were at my side. Duntharmo heard the sound of our approach. He gathered the strength of Teutha. He stood on a hill with his host. They were like rocks broken with thunder, when their bent trees are singed and bare, and the streams of their chinks have failed. The stream of Teutha rolled, in its pride, before the gloomy foe. I sent a bard to Duntharmo, to offer the combat on the plain; but he smiled in the darkness of his pride. His unsettled host moved on the hill; like the mountain cloud, when the blast has entered its womb, and scatters the curling gloom on every side.

They brought Colmar to Teutha's bank, bound with a thousand thongs. The chief is sad, but stately. His eye is on his friends; for we stood in our arms, whilst Teutha's waters rolled between. Duntharmo came with his spear, and pierced the hero's side: he rolled on the bank in his blood. We heard his broken sighs. Calthon rushed into the stream: I bounded forward on my spear. Teutha's race fell before us. Night came rolling down. Duntharmo rested on a rock, amidst an aged wood. The rage of his bosom burned against the car-borne Calthon. But Calthon stood in his grief; he mourned the fallen Colmar; Colmar slain in youth, before his fame arose!

I bade the song of woe to rise, to sooth the mournful chief, but he stood beneath a tree, and often threw his spear on earth. The humid eye of Colmal rolled near in a secret tear: she foresaw the fall of Duntharmo, or of Clutha's warlike chief. Now half the night had passed away. Silence and darkness were on the field. Sleep rested on the eyes of the heroes; Calthon's settling soul was still. His eyes were half closed; but the murmur of Teutha had not yet failed in his ear. Pale, and showing his wounds, the ghost of Colmar came; he bent his head over the hero, and raised his feeble voice!

"Sleeps the son of Rathnor in his night, and his brother low? Did we not rise to the chase together? Pursued we not the darkbrown hinds? Colmar was not forgot till he fell, till death had blasted his youth. I lie pale beneath the rock of Lona. O let Calthon rise! the morning comes with its beams; Duntharmo will dishonour the fallen." He passed away in his blast. The rising Calthon saw the steps of his departure. He rushed in the sound of his steel. Unhappy Colmal rose. She followed her hero through night, and dragged her spear behind. But when Calthon came to Lona's rock, he found his fallen brother. The rage of his bosom rose; he rushed among the foe. The groans of death ascend. They close around the chief. He is bound in the midst, and brought to gloomy Duntharmo. The shout of joy arose; and the hills of night replied.

I started at the sound; and took my father's spear. Diaran rose at my side; and the youthful strength of Dargo. We missed the chief of Clutha, and our souls were sad. I dreaded the departure of my fame. The pride of my valour rose. "Sons of Morven!" I said, "it is not thus our fathers fought. They rested not on the field of strangers, when the foe was not fallen before them. Their strength was like the eagles of heaven: their renown is in the song. But our people fall by degrees. Our fame begins to depart. What shall the king of Morven say, if Ossian conquers not at Teutha? Rise in your steel, ye warriors! follow the sound of Ossian's course. He will not return, but renowned, to the echoing walls of Selma."

Morning rose on the blue waters of Teutha. Colmal stood before me in tears. She told of the chief of Clutha: thrice the spear fell from her hand. My wrath turned against the stranger; for my soul trembled for Calthon. "Son of the feeble hand!" I said, "do Teutha's warriors fight with tears? The battle is not won with grief; nor dwells the sigh in the soul of war. Go to the deer of Carun, to the lowing herds of Teutha. But leave these arms, thou son of fear! a warrior may lift them in fight."

I tore the mail from her shoulders. Her snowy breast appeared. She bent her blushing face to the ground. I looked in silence to the chiefs. The spear fell from my hand; the sigh of my bosom rose. But when I heard the name of the maid, my crowding tears rushed down. I blessed the lovely beam of youth, and bade the battle move!

Why, son of the rock, should Ossian tell how Teutha's warriors died? They are now forgot in their land; their tombs are not found on the heath. Years came on with their storms. The green mounds are mouldered away. Scarce is the grave of Duntharmo seen, or the place where he fell by the spear of Ossian. Some grey warrior, half blind with age, sitting by night at the flaming oak of the hall, tells now my deeds to his sons, and the fall of the dark Duntharmo. The faces of youth bend sidelong towards his voice. Surprise and joy burn in their eyes!—I found Calthon bound to an oak; my sword cut the thongs from his hands. I gave him the white-bosomed Colmal. They dwell in the halls of Teutha.

BALOW, my babe, lye still and sleipe !

Balow, my boy, thy mothers joy,
Thy father breides me great annoy.

Mine hart can neire depart him frae,
Balow, &c.

But doe not doe not, prettie mine,
To faynings fals thine hart incline ;
Be loyal to thy luvier trew,

Thy winsome smiles maun eise my paine ;

And quite forget man's cruelty.

They'll use us then they care not how.
Balow, my babe, ly stil, and sleipe,
It grieves me sair to see thee weipe.

AULD ROBIN GRAY.

By Lady Anne Barnard.

WHEN the sheep are in the fauld, when the cows
come hame,
When a' the weary world to quiet rest are gane,
The woes of my heart fa' in showers frae my ee, Unken'd by my gudeman, who soundly sleeps by
me.

Young Jamie loo'd me weel, and sought me fo^r
his bride ;
But saving ae crown-piece, he'd naething else beside.
To make the crown a pound, my Jamie gaed to
sea ;
And the crown and the pound, O they were baith
for me !

Before he had been gane a twelvemonth and a
day,
My father brak his arm, our cow was stown
away ;
My mother she fell sick—my Jamie was at sea—
And auld Robin Gray, oh ! he came a-courting
me.

My father cou'dna work—my mother cou'dna
spin ;
I toil'd day and night, but their bread I cou'dna win ;
Auld Rob maintain'd them baith, and, wi' tears
in his ee,
Said, " Jenny, oh ! for their sakes, will you marry me ? "

My heart it said na, and I look'd for Jamie back ;
But hard blew the winds, and his ship was a wrack :
His ship it was a wrack ! Why didna Jamie dee ?
Or, wherefore am I spar'd to cry out, Woe is
me !

My father argued sair—my mother didna speak,
But she look'd in my face till my heart was like to break ;
They gied him my hand, but my heart was in the sea ;
And so auld Robin Gray, he was gudeman to me.

I hadna been his wife, a week but only four,
When mournfu' as I sat on the stane at my
door,
I saw my Jamie's ghaist—I cou'dna think it he,
Till he said, " I'm come hame, my love, to marry
thee ! "

O snir, sair did we greet, and mickle say o' a' ;
Ae kiss we took, nae mair—I bad him gang awa.

I wish that I were dead, but I'm no like to dee ;

For O, I am but young to cry out, Woe is me !

I gang like a ghaist, and I carena much to spin ;

I darena think o' Jamie, for that wad be a sin.
But I will do my best a gude wife aye to be,
For auld Robin Gray, oh ! he is sae kind to
me.

THE BRAES O' GLENIFFER.

By Robert Tannahill^b.

Born 1774.—Died 1810.

KEEN blows the wind o'er the braes o' Gleniffer.
The auld castle turrets are cover'd wi' snaw.
How chang'd frae the time when I met wi' my lover

Amang the broom bushes by Stanley green shaw !

The wild flow'rs o' simmer were spread a' sae bonnie.

The mavis sang sweet frae the green birken
tree :

But far to the camp they hae march'd my dear
Johnie,

And now it is winter wi' nature and me.

Then ilk thing around us was blithesome and cheerie.

Then ilk thing around us was bonnie and braw ;

Now naething is heard but the wind whistling drearie.

And naething is seen but the wide-spreading snaw.

The trees are a' bare, and the birds mute and dowie ;

They shake the cauld drift frae their wings
as they flee :

And chirp out their complaints, seeming wae for my Johnie ;

'Tis winter wi' them, and 'tis winter wi' me.

Yon cauld sleety cloud skiffs along the bleak mountain,

And shakes the dark firs on the steep rocky brae,

While down the deep glen bawls the snaw-
flooded fountain,

That murmur'd sae sweet to my laddie and
me.

It's no its loud roar, on the wintry wind swellin',
It's no the cauld blast brings the tear i' my e'e ;

For O ! gin I saw but my bonnie Scots c-llan,
The dark days o' winter were simmer to
me.

THE WIDOW'S LAMENT.

By James Hogg.

[The Ettrick Shepherd.]

Born 1772.—Died 1835.

Oh, thou art lovely yet, my boy,
Even in thy winding sheet !
I canna leave thy comely clay,
And features calm and sweet.
I have no hope but for the day
That we shall meet again.
Since thou art gane, my bonnie boy,
And left me here alane.

I hoped thy sire's loved form to see,
To trace his looks in thine ;
And saw, wi' joy, thy sparkling e'e
Wi' kindling vigour shine :
I thought, when I was fail'd, I might
Wi' you and yours remain ;
But thou art fled, my bonnie boy,
And left me here alane.

Now closed and set that sparkling e'e,
Thy breast is cauld as clay ;
And a' my hope, and a' my joy,
Wi' thee are reft away.
Ah, fain wad I that comely clay
Reanimate again !
But thou art fled, my bonnie boy,
And left me here alane.

The flower now fading on the lea,
Shall fresher rise to view ;
The leaf just falling frae the tree,
The year will soon renew ;
But lang may I weep o'er thy grave
Ere thou revivest again,
For thou art fled, my bonnie boy,
And left me here alane !

THE BENS OF YARROW.

SHE kissed his cheek, she kamed his hair,
As oft she'd done before O ;
She belted him with his noble sword,
And he's awa' to Yarrow.
As he gaed up the Tennies bank—
I wot he gaed wi' sorrow ;
And there he spied nine armed men
On the dowie howms of Yarrow !

O come ye here to part your lands
The bonnie forest thorough ;
Or come ye here to wield your brands
On the bonnie banks of Yarrow ?
We come na here to part our lands,
To beg, nor yet to borrow ;
We come to use our noble brands
On the bonnie banks of Yarrow.

I see ye all, nine men to ane—
That's an unequal marrow ;
Yet will I fight, while lasts my brand,
For my true love on Yarrow.

Four has he hurt, four has he slain—
 Their blood dropt in the Yarrow,
 Till that fierce knight came him behind
 And ran his body thorough.

Gae hame, gae hame now, brother John,
 And tell your sister Sarah
 To come and lift her leafu' lord—
 He's sleeping sound on Yarrow.
 And he went to his sister's bower—
 I wot he gade wi' sorrow;
 There is a fair knight bleeds to death
 In the dowie dens of Yarrow.

Yestreen I dream'd a dolefu' dream—
 I fear there will be sorrow:
 I dream'd I pu'd the heather green
 To bed my love by Yarrow,
 O gentle wind, now blowing south,
 From where my love repaireth,
 Bring me a word from his dear mouth,
 To tell me how he fareth.

And he went down the high high hill—
 She went wi' dule and sorrow:
 She saw her love wi' nine dead men
 Lie in the links of Yarrow:
 She kissed his cheek, she shed his hair,
 She search'd his wounds all thorough;
 And kissed them till her lips grew red,
 On the dowie links of Yarrow.

Now haud your tongue, my daughter dear,
 Thy moan breeds nickle sorrow;
 I'll find thee a far nobler lord
 Than him ye lost on Yarrow.
 The mavis, it shall mourn in spring,
 And sunshine freeze the Yarrow,
 Before ye find so sweet a youth
 As him for whom I sorrow.

MARY OF CASTLE-CARY.

By Hector Macneill.

Saw ye my wee thing, saw ye my ain thing,
 Saw ye my true love down on yon lea—
 Crossed she the meadow yestreen at the gloaming, Sought she the burnie where flowers the hawtree?
 Her hair it is lint-white, her skin it is milk-
 white,
 Dark is the blue of her soft rolling e'e;
 Red, red her ripe lips, and sweeter than roses,
 Where could my wee thing wander frae me?

I saw nae your wee thing, I saw nae your ain thing,
 Nor saw I your true love down by yon lea;
 But I met my bonnie thing late in the gloaming,
 Down by the burnie where flowers the hawtree:

Her hair it was lint-white, her skin it was milk-
 white,
 Dark was the blue of her soft rolling e'e;
 Red were her ripe lips and sweeter than roses—
 Sweet were the kisses that she gave to me.

It was nae my wee thing, it was nae my ain thing,
 It was nae my true love ye met by the tree:
 Proud is her leal heart, modest her nature,
 She never loved ony till ance she lo'ed me.
 Her name it is Mary, she's frae Castle-cary,
 Aft has she sat when a bairn on my knee:
 Fair as your face is, were't fifty times fairer,
 Young bragger she ne'er wad gie kisses to
 thee.

It was then your Mary, she's frae Castle-cary,
 It was then your true love I met by the tree;
 Proud as her heart is and modest her nature,
 Sweet were the kisses that she gave to me.
 Sair gloomed his dark brow, blood-red his cheek
 grew,
 Wild flashed the fire frae his red rolling e'e; Ye'se rue sair this morning your boasts and your scorning,
 Defend ye fause traitor, fu' loudly ye lie.

Away wi' beguiling, cried the youth smiling—
 Off went the bonnet, the lint-white locks flee,
 The belted plaid fa'ing, her white bosom shawing,
 Fair stood the loved maid wi' the dark roleing
 e'e.
 Is it my wee thing, is it my ain thing,
 Is it my true love here that I see?
 O Jamie forgie me, your heart's constant to me,
 I'll never mair wander, dear laddie, frae thee.

HERE AWA', THERE AWA'.

HERE awa', there awa', here awa', Willie,
 Here awa', there awa', here awa' hame;
 Lang have I sought thee, dear have I bought
 thee,
 Now I have gotten my Willie, again.

Through the lang muir I have follow'd my Willie,
 Through the lang muir I have follow'd him
 hame;
 Whatever betide us, nought shall divide us;
 Love now rewards all my sorrow and pain.

Here awa', there awa', here awa', Willie,
 Here awa', there awa', here awa' hame;
 Come love, believe me, naething can grieve me,
 Ilka thing pleases while Willie's at hame.

Maids, have ye seen him, my ain true love Willie?
 Blithe as the bird when the bud's on the tree?
 If ye have seen him, and dinna esteem him,
 Ye havena seen Willie, the lad who loes me.

MISCELLANEOUS POEMS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

SONG.

By Mrs. Opie.

Born 1771.

Go, youth beloved, in distant glades,
New friends, new hopes, new joys to find !
Yet sometimes deign, midst fairer maids,
To think on her thou leav'st behind.
Thy love, thy fate, dear youth, to share
Must never be my happy lot ;
But thou mayst grant this humble prayer,
Forget me not, forget me not !

Yet, should the thought of my distress
Too painful to thy feelings be,
Heed not the wish I now express.
Nor ever deign to think on me :
But, oh ! if grief thy steps attend,
If want, if sickness be thy lot,
And thou require a soothing friend,
Forget me not ! forget me not !

A PASTORAL.

By John Clare.*

SURELY Lucy love returns,
Though her meaning's not reveal'd ;
Surely love her bosom burns,
Which her coyness keeps conceal'd :
Else what means that flushing cheek,
When with her I chance to be ?
And those looks, that almost speak
A secret warmth of love for me ?

Would she, where she valued not,
Give such proofs of sweet esteem ?
Think what flowers for me she's got—
What can this but fondness seem ?
When, to try their pleasing powers,
Swains for her cull every grove,—
When she takes my meaner flowers,
What can guide the choice but love ?

Was not love seen yesternight,
When two sheep had rambled out ?
Who but Lucy set them right ?
The token told, without a doubt.
When others stare, she turns and frowns ;
When I but glance, a smile I see ;
When others talk, she calls them clowns ;
But never says such words to me.

* A Northamptonshire peasant.

And when, with swains to love bebind,
To bear her milk I often go,
Though they beg first, she turns behind,
And lingers till I ask her too.
O'er stepping-stones that cross the brook,
Who mind such trifles plainly see,
In vain the shepherds prop their hooks
She always gives her hand to me.

To-day, while all were standing by,
She wish'd for roses from the bower ;
The man too wish'd was in her eye,
Though others flew to get the flower :
And striving all they could to please,
When prick'd with thorns they left the tree,
She never seem'd concern'd at these,
But only turn'd to caution me.

To-day she careless view'd the bark
Where many a swain had cut her name,
Till whisper'd which was Colin's mark,
Her cheek was instant in a flame :
In blushing beckons love did call,
And courage seiz'd the chance the while ;
And though I kiss'd her 'fore them all,
Her worst rebukings were a smile.

STANZAS ADDRESSED TO THE AUTHOR'S MOTHER

By the Author of "Rouge et Noir."

BELIEVE me, though my idle shell
Hath never breathed thy name before,
It was not that its voice could tell
Of one on earth I value more !
When thoughts of thee my soul came o'er,
I found, alas, a feeble lay
But ill expressed the love I bore—
It said not what my heart would say.

And, if I now attempt to dwell
Upon a matchless Mother's praise,
Each word must, like a cypher, swell
The sum my fond affection pays :
Remember, did mine infant gaze
E'er thank thee for thy tenderness ?
And, as thy spirit read its rays,
Imagine—all I can't express !

What, if no proud or prosperous star
Hath bent upon my brow to shine—
If fortune marred, or still should mar,
The fault was ne'er—can ne'er be thine :

Thy hopes, thy zeal, thy tears, were mine—
Thy morning prayer, thy midnight thought—
I would not for a throne resign
That gratitude thy love hath taught.

Well I bethink me of the day
The black-plumed hearse was at our gate
Which bore my Father's corse away—
And left thee lone and desolate !
The muffled drum (no more elate)
Its deep and solemn requiem gave,
As, moving on in martial state,
They took him to his early grave.

Well I bethink me how they laid
His sword and helm upon the pall ;
And how my young eye, dimmed, dismayed,
Beheld a Father's funeral ;
How thou upon his name didst call,
And swooned away in speechless pain—
Oh, even now I see it all
As truly as I saw it then !

And, ever since, thy fostering love,
Through weal and woe was still the same—
Thy prayer, that I should never prove Unworthy of my Father's name.
And O, if honour's star-born flame
Within my breast hath ever shone,
Through thee the noble impulse came—
My errors have been all mine own.

And I may blush to think how ill
The lesser by example taught
Have ruled my wayward spirit—still,
I feel they are not all forgot :
Like dew, with living essence fraught,
They yet may clothe the naked tree—
And on the bare and barren spot
Wake verdure imperceptibly.

But there is one young heart, to whom
Thy virtues and her sire's descend—
As moonlight's beam, and sunset's bloom,
On clouds of eve a moment blend :
O, mayst thou long be spared to lend
That light which guides her youth so well—
And, yet again, with blessings bend
O'er him who bids thee now, farewell !

INNOCENCE.

By Charles Lamb.

Born 1775.—Died 1834.

WE were two pretty babes, the youngest she,
The youngest, and the loveliest far, I ween,
And Innocence her name. The time has been,
We two did love each other's company ;
Time was, we two had wept to have been apart.
But when, by show of seeming good beguil'd,
I left the garb and manners of a child,
And my first love for man's society,
Defiling with the world my virgin heart—
My loved companion dropped a tear, and fled,
And hid in deepest shades her awful head.
Beloved, who shall tell me where thou art—
In what delicious Eden to be found—
That I may seek thee the wide world around ?

THE EXHIBITED DWARF.

By Thomas Haynes Bayly.

I LAY without my father's door,
A wretched dwarfish boy ;
I did not dare to lift the latch,—
I heard the voice of joy ;
Too well I knew when I was near,
My father never smiled ;
And she who bore me turn'd away,
Abhorring her poor child.

A stranger saw me, and he bribed
My parents with his gold ;
Oh ! deeper shame awaited me—
The dwarfish boy was sold !
They never loved me, never claim'd
The love I could have felt ;
And yet, with bitter tears, I left
The cottage where they dwelt.

The stranger seem'd more kind to me,
He spoke of brighter days ;
He lured each slumb'ring talent forth,
And gave unwonted praise ;
Unused to smiles, how ardently
I panted for applause !
And daily he instructed me—
Too soon I learn'd the cause.

I stood upon his native shore ;
The secret was explain'd ;
I was a vile, degraded slave,
In mind and body chain'd ;
Condemn'd to face, day after day,
The rabble's ruffian gaze ;
To shrink before their merriment,
Or blush before their praise !

In anguish I must still perform
The oft-repeated task ;
And courteously reply to all
Frivolity may ask !
And bear inhuman scrutiny,
And hear the hateful jest !
And sing the song,—then crawl away
To tears instead of rest !

I know I am diminutive,
Aye, loathsome, if you will ;
But say, ye hard hearts ! am I not
A human being still ?
With feelings sensitive as yours,
Perhaps I have been born ;
I could not wound a fellow man
In mockery, or scorn !

But some there are who seem to shrink
Away from me at first,
And then speak kindly ; to my heart
That trial is the worst !
Oh, then I long to kneel to them,
Imploring them to save
A hopeless wretch, who only asks
An honourable grave !

STANZAS FOR MUSIC.

By the Rev. T. Dale.*

O BREATHE no more that simple air,—
 Though soft and sweet thy wild notes swell,
 To me the only tale they tell
 Is cold despair !
 I heard it once from lips as fair,
 I heard it in as sweet a tone,—
 Now I am left on earth alone,
 And she is—where ?

How have those well-known sounds renewed
 The dreams of earlier, happier hours,
 When life—a desert now—was strewed
 With fairy flowers !—
 Then all was bright, and fond, and fair,—
 Now flowers are faded, joys are fled,
 And heart and hope are with the dead,
 For she is—where ?

Can I then love the air she loved ?
 Can I then hear the melting strain
 Which brings her to my soul again,
 Calm and unmoved !—
 And thou to blame my tears for bear ;
 For while I list, sweet maid ! to thee,
 Remembrance whispers, “ such was she,”
 And she is—where ?

CASABIANCA.

[Young Casabianca, a boy about thirteen years old, son to the Admiral of L'Orient, remained at his post (in the Battle of the Nile) after the ship had taken fire, and all the guns had been abandoned ; and the gallant youth perished in the explosion of the vessel, when the flames had reached the powder.]

THE boy stood on the burning deck
 Whence all but him had fled ;
 The flame that lit the battle's wreck
 Shone round him o'er the dead.
 Yet beautiful and bright he stood,
 As born to rule the storm ;
 A creature of heroic blood,
 A proud though childlike form !

The flames rolled on—he would not go
 • Without his father's word ;
 That father, faint in death below,
 His voice no longer heard.
 He called aloud :—“ say, father ! say,
 If yet my task is done !”
 He knew not that the chieftain lay
 Unconscious of his son.

“ Speak, father !” once again he cried,
 “ If I may yet be gone !
 And”—but the booming shots replied,
 And fast the flames rolled on.
 Upon his brow he felt their breath,
 And in his waving hair,
 And looked from that lone post of death
 In still yet brave despair !

And shouted but once more aloud,
 “ My father, must I stay ?”
 While o'er him fast, through sail and shroud,
 The wreathing fires made way :
 They wrapt the ship in splendour wild,
 They caught the flag on high,
 And streamed above the gallant child,
 Like banners in the sky.
 There came a burst of thunder-sound—
 The boy—oh ! where was he ?
 Ask of the winds, that far around
 With fragments strewed the sea !
 With mast, and helm, and pennon fair,
 That well had borne their part—
 But the noblest thing which perished there,
 Was that young faithful heart !

THE LION AND CAMELOPARD.

By Thomas Pringle.Author of “ South African Sketches,” &c.*

WOULD'ST thou view the lion's den ?
 Search afar from haunts of men—
 Where the reed-encircled fountain
 Oozes from the rocky mountain,
 By its verdure far deserted,
 And the desert brown and wide.
 Close beside the sedgy brim
 Couchant lurks the lion grim,
 Waiting till the close of day
 Brings again the destined prey.
 Heedless at the ambushed brink
 The tall Giraffe stoops down to drink :
 Upon him straight the savage springs
 With cruel joy !—The desert rings
 With clanging sound of desperate strife—
 For the prey is strong and strives for life ;
 Plunging oft, with frantic bound,
 To shake the tyrant to the ground ;
 Then bursts like whirlwind through the waste,
 In hope to 'scape by headlong haste :
 In vain !—the spoiler on his prize
 Rides proudly—tearing as he flies.
 For life—the victim's utmost speed
 Is mustered in this hour of need—
 For life—for life—his giant might
 He strains, and pours his soul in flight ;
 And, mad with terror, thirst, and pain,
 Spurns with wild hoof the thundering plain.
 'Tis vain ; the thirsty sands are drinking
 His streaming blood—his strength is sinking—
 The victor's fangs are in his veins—
 His flanks are streaked with sanguine stains—
 His panting breast in foam and gore
 Is bathed :—He reels—his race is o'er !
 He falls—and with convulsive throes,
 Resigns his throat to the raging foe ;
 Who revels amidst his dying moans :—
 While, gathering round to pick his bones,
 The vultures watch, in gaunt array,
 Till the gorged monarch quits his prey.

THE CORANNA*.

By the Same.

FAST by his wild resounding river
 The listless Coran lingers ever ;
 Still drives his heifers forth to feed,
 Sooth'd by the gorrah's humming reed† ;
 A wanderer still uncheck'd doth range,
 As humour calls, or seasons change ;
 His tent of mats and household gear
 All packed upon the patient steer.
 'Midst all his wanderings hating toil,
 He never tills the stubborn soil ;
 But on the milky dams depends,
 And what spontaneous Nature sends.
 Or, should long-parching droughts prevail,
 And milk, and bulbs, and locusts fail,
 He lays him down to sleep away
 In languid sloth the weary day ;
 Oft as he feels gaunt hunger's stound‡,
 Still tightening "famine's girdle"§ round ;
 Lull'd by the sound of the Gariep ||
 Beneath the willows murmuring deep,
 T'ill thunder-clouds, surcharged with rain,
 Pear verd are o'er the panting plain ;
 And call the famish'd dreamer from his trance,
 To feast on milk and mead, and wake the moonlight dance.

By William Hayley¶.

Born 1745.—Died 1820.

Go, faithful sonnet, to Serena say
 What charms peculiar in her features reign :
 A stranger, whom her glance may ne'er survey,
 Pays her this tribute in a flattering strain.
 Tell her, the bard, in Beaut's wide domain,
 Has seen a virgin cheek as richly glow ;
 A bosom, where the blue incandring vein
 Sheds as soft lustre through the living snow ;
 Eyes, that as brightly flash with joy and youth ;
 And locks, that like her own luxuriant flow.
 Then say, for then she cannot doubt thy truth,
 That the wide earth no female form can show
 Where Nature's legend so distinctly tells,
 'In this fair shrine a fairer spirit dwells.'

* The Corannas are a tribe of independent Hottentots.

¶ Hayley is now very rarely read, and perhaps hardly deserves a permanent place in the rank of British Poets, but as he was once popular, and as I have given no specimen of his verse in an earlier part of this volume, I have thought it advisable to insert the above sonnet amongst the miscellaneous poetry of the nineteenth century, though it does not, strictly speaking, belong to this period, for it is extracted from Hayley's longest and best known work, "The Triumphs of Temper," which was published in 1781. These fourteen lines are the best he ever wrote and are certainly neat and graceful.—Compiler.

RECOLLECTIONS.

By Mrs. Norton.

"Do you remember all the sunny places,
 Where, in bright days, long past, we play'd together ?
 Do you remember all the old home faces,
 That gather'd round the hearth in wintry weather ?
 Do you remember all the happy meetings,
 In summer evenings, round the open door—
 Kind looks, kind hearts, kind words, and tender greetings,
 And clasping hands, whose pulses beat no more ?
 Do you remember them ?

"Do you remember all the merry laughter ;
 The voices round the swing in our old garden ;
 The dog that, when we ran, still follow'd after ;
 The teasing frolic, sure of speedy pardon !
 We were but children then, young, happy creatures,
 And hardly knew how much we had to lose—
 But now the dreamlike memory of those features
 Comes back, and bids my darken'd spirit muse.
 Do you remember them ?

"Do you remember when we first departed
 From all the old companions who were round us,
 How very soon again we grew light-hearted,
 And talk'd, with smiles, of all the links which bound us ?
 And after, when our footsteps were returning
 With unfeigned weariness o'er hill and plain,
 How our young hearts kept boiling up, and burning,
 To think how soon we'd be at home again !
 Do you remember this ?

"Do you remember how the dreams of glory
 Kept fading from us like a fairy treasure ;
 How we thought less of being famed in story,
 And more of those to whom our fame gave pleasure !
 Do you remember in far countries, weeping,
 When a light breeze, a flower, hath brought to mind
 Old happy thoughts, which till that hour were sleeping,
 And made us yearn for those we left behind !
 Do you remember this ?

"Do you remember when no sound 'woke gladly,
 But desolate echoes through our home were ringing,
 How for a while we talked—then paused full sadly,
 Because our voices bitter thoughts were bringing !
 Ah me ! those days—those days ! my friend, my brother,
 Sit down and let us talk of all our woe,
 For we have nothing left but one another ;—
 Yet where they went, old playmate, we shall go—
 Let us remember this."

THE CONVICT SHIP.

By T. K. Hervey, Esq.

MORN on the waters !—and, purple and bright,
 Bursts on the billows the flushing of the light ;
 O'er the glad waves, like a child of sun,
 See the tall vessel goes gallantly on ;
 Full to the breeze she unbosoms her sail,
 And her pennon streams onward, like hope in the

The winds come around her, in murmur and song,
 And the surges rejoice, as they bear her along.
 See ! she looks up to the golden-edged clouds,
 And the sailor sings gaily aloft in the shrouds :
 Onward she glides, amid ripple and spray,
 Over the waters,—away, and away !
 Bright as the visions of youth, ere they part,
 Passing away, like a dream of the heart !
 Who, as the beautiful pageant sweeps by,
 Music around her, and sunshine on high—
 Pauses to think, amid glitter and glow,
 Oh ! there be hearts that are breaking below !
 Night on the waves !—and the moon is on high,
 Hung, like a gem, on the brow of the sky,
 Treading its depths in the power of her might,
 And turning the clouds, as they pass her, to light !
 Look to the waters !—asleep on their breast,
 Seems not to the ship like an island of rest !
 Bright and alone on the shadowy main,
 Like a heart-cherished home on some desolate plain !
 Who—as she smiles in the silvery light,
 Spreading her wings on the bosom of night,
 Alone on the deep, as the moon in the sky,
 A phantom of beauty—could deem, with a sigh,
 That so lovely a thing is the mansion of sin,
 And souls that are smitten he bursting within ?
 Who—as he watches her silently gliding—
 Remembers that wave after wave is dividing
 Bosoms that sorrow and guilt could not sever,
 Hearts which are parted and broken for ever ?
 Or deems that he watches, afloat on the wave,
 The death-bed of hope, or the young spirit's grave ?

'T is thus with our life ; while it passes along,
 Like a vessel at sea, amid sunshine and song !
 Gaily we glide, in the gaze of the world,
 With streamers afloat, and with canvas unfurled ;
 All gladness and glory, to wandering eyes,
 Yet chartered by sorrow, and freighted with sighs :—
 Fading and false is the aspect it wears,
 As the smiles we put on, just to cover our tears ;
 And the withering thoughts which the world cannot
 know,
 Like heart-broken exiles lie burning below ;
 Whilst the vessel drives on to that desolate shore,
 Where the dreams of our childhood are vanished and o'er !

THE FAMILY PICTURE.

By Sir Aubrey De Vere Hunt.

WITH work in hand, perchance some fairy cap,
 To deck the little stranger yet to come ;
 One rosy boy struggling to mount her lap—
 The eldest studious, with a book or map—
 Her timid girl beside, with a faint bloom,
 Conning some tale—while, with no gentle tap,
 Yon chubby urchin beats his mimic drum,
 Nor heeds the doubtful frown her eyes assume.
 So sits the mother ! with her fondest smile
 Regarding her sweet little ones the while.
 And he, the happy man ! to whom belong
 These treasures, feels their living charms beguile
 All mortal cares, and eyes the prattling throng
 With rapture-rising heart, and a thanksgiving tongue !

THE SHADOW.

By John Malcolm.

UPON yon dial-stone
 Behold the shade of Time,
 For ever circling on and on,
 In silence more sublime
 Than if the thunder of the spheres
 Pealed forth its march to mortal ears.
 It meets us hour by hour,
 Doles out our little span,
 Reveals a presence and a power,
 Felt and confessed by man ;—
 The drop of moments, day by day,
 That rocks of ages wear away.
 Wov'n by a hand unseen,
 Upon that stone survey
 A robe of dark, sepulchral green,
 The mantle of decay,—
 The fold of chill Oblivion's pall,
 That falleth with yon shadow's fall.
 Day is the time for toil ;
 Night balm the weary breast ;
 Stars have their vigils, seas awhile
 Will sink to peaceful rest :
 But round and round the shadow creeps
 Of that which slumbers not—nor sleeps !
 Effacing all that's fair,—
 Hushing the voice of mirth
 Into the silence of despair
 Around the lonesome hearth,—
 And training ivy garlands green
 O'er the once gay and social scene.
 In beauty fading fast,
 Its silent trace appears,—
 And—where, a phantom of the past,
 Dim in the mists of years,—
 Gleams Tadmor o'er Oblivion's waves,
 Like wrecks above their ocean graves.—
 Before the ceaseless shade,
 That round the world doth sail—
 Its towers and temples bow the head—
 The pyramids look pale :
 The festal halls grow hushed and cold,
 The everlasting hills wax old.
 Coeval with the sun
 Its silent course began—
 And still its phantom race shall run,
 Till worlds with age grow wan ;
 Till Darkness spread her funeral pall,
 And one vast shadow circle all.

THE HOLIDAY.

By N. T. Carrington.*

IT is a morn of June :—from east to west
 The ships are steerless on the Channel's breast ;
 And o'er the rocks that fringe isle, reef, and bay,
 Light rolling now the murmuring surges play ;
 In music breaking where of late the roar

* Mr. Carrington, who has been some years dead, was a schoolmaster in Devonshire. He wrote a descriptive poem entitled Dartmoor.—Compiler.

Atlantic, burst around the groaning shore :
 For Ocean here his billow flings on high,
 If the spring-breeze but sportively pass by ;
 But lists to Summer's breathings—wooded and won
 By the warm kisses of the conquering sun.

It is a morn of June :—the gentle spring
 Has flown : but shook such freshness from her wing
 O'er field and grove, that Summer's matron day
 Wears thy rich virgin hues, delicious May ;
 And there are strains from bush, and brake, and bower,
 Raptured as those which bless the vernal hour.
 All earth is vocal ; and the heavens reply,—
 A thousand voices wander through the sky :
 For there the lark—the master-minstrel sings,
 And upward—upward soars on fearless wings ;
 Till earth recal him to her verdant breast,
 And love direct the lyrist to his nest.

O, sweet is such a morn to him who loves
 The heaven's clear song—the harmonies of groves ;—
 Who blessed by leisure, strays in woodlands green,
 And wanders oft through all the breathing scene ;—
 'Mid leafy luxuries who takes his rest,
 Or bathes his brow in breezes of the west ;
 On mountain, moorland, seeks Hygeian gales,
 Or dwells with silence in the fragrant vales.
 All lovely sounds are with him ; lark and bee,
 Lute and thrush, unite their melody ;
 And waterfall, and streams that down the hills
 Melodious rush, and voices of the rills.
 He, as he hears of birds the summer mirth
 And all the impassioned poetry of earth,
 Looks at the bright, blue dawn—a dawn like this,
 Feels at each lightsome step increasing bliss ;
 And as he winds his flower-fringed path along,
 Delighted wakes his own full-hearted song.

What are his joys to mine ? The groves are green,
 And fair the flowers ; and there are ever seen
 By him the mountain's breast, the hills, the woods,
 Grass-waving fields, and bright and wandering floods ;
 The lays of birds are ever on his ear,
 Music and sylvan beauty crown his year ;—
 But if to him the rural reign have power
 To fill with joy the swift-revolving hour,
 What rapture must be mine, so seldom given,
 To feel the beam and drink the gale of heaven !
 For O ! I love thee, Nature ; and my eye
 Has felt "the witchery of the soft, blue sky ;"
 Bear witness, glowing Summer, how I love
 Thy green world here, thy azure arch above !
 But seldom comes the hour that snaps my chain,
 To me thou art all beautiful in vain !
 Bird, bee, and butterfly, are on the wing,
 Songs shake the woods, and streams are murmuring ;
 But far from them—the world's unwilling slave,
 My aching brow no genial breezes lave ;
 Few are the glad some hours that come to cheer
 With flowers and songs my dull, unvarying year :
 Yet when they come, as now,—from loathed night
 The bird upsprings to hail the welcome light
 With soul less buoyant than I turn to thee,
 Prized for thy absence, sylvan Liberty !

THE BURIAL OF SIR JOHN MOORE.

By the Rev. C. Wolfe.

Born 1791.—Died 1823.

Not a drum was heard, not a funeral note,
 As his corse to the rampart we hurried ;
 Not a soldier discharged his farewell shot,
 O'er the grave where our hero we buried.

We buried him darkly at dead of night,
 The sods with our bayonets turning ;
 By the struggling moonbeam's misty light,
 And the lantern dimly burning.

No useless coffin enclosed his breast,
 Nor in sheet nor in shroud we wound him ;
 But he lay like a warrior taking his rest,
 With his martial cloak around him.

Few and short were the prayers we said,
 And we spoke not a word of sorrow ;
 But we steadfastly gazed on the face that was dead,
 And we bitterly thought of the morrow.

We thought, as we hollowed his narrow bed,
 And smoothed down his lonely pillow,
 That the foe and the stranger would tread o'er his
 head,
 And we far away on the billow ;

Lightly they 'll talk of the spirit that's gone,
 And o'er his cold ashes upbraid him,
 But little he 'll reck if they let him sleep on
 In the grave where a Briton has laid him.

But half of our heavy task was done,
 When the clock struck the hour for retiring ;
 And we heard the distant and random gun
 That the foe was sullenly firing.

Slowly and sadly we laid him down,
 From the field of his fame fresh and gory ;
 We carved not a line, and we raised not a stone,
 But we left him alone with his glory.

[The above ode is reprinted from "Wolfe's Remains" the Editor of which professes to give the Author's last Corrections. The following passage in the narrative of Sir John Moore's burial (published in the Edinburgh Annual Register for 1808) is said to have suggested the poem.

"Sir John Moore had often said that if he was killed in battle, he wished to be buried where he fell. The body was removed at midnight to the citadel of Corunna. A grave was dug for him on the rampart there, by a party of the 9th Regiment, the aides-de-camp attending by turns. No coffin could be procured, and the officers of his staff wrapped the body, dressed as it was, in a military cloak and blankets. The interment was hastened ; for, about eight in the morning, some firing was heard, and the officers feared that if a serious attack were made they should be ordered away, and not suffered to pay him their last duty. The officers of his family bore him to the grave, the funeral service was read by the chaplain ; and the corpse was covered with earth."

THE NEGLECTED CHILD.

By Thomas Haynes Bayley.

I NEVER was a favourite,
 My mother never smiled
 On me with half the tenderness
 That bless'd her fairer child ;
 I've seen her kiss my sister's cheek,
 While fondled on her knee ;
 I've turn'd away to hide my tears—
 There was no kiss for me !

And yet I strove to please, with all
 My little store of sense ;
 I strove to please, and infancy
 Can rarely give offence ;
 But when my artless efforts met
 A cold, ungentle check,
 I did not dare to throw myself
 In tears upon her neck.

How blessed are the beautiful !
 Love watches o'er their birth ;
 Oh, beauty ! in my nursery
 I learn'd to know thy worth ;
 For even there, I often felt
 Forsaken and forlorn,
 And wish'd—for others wish'd it too—
 I never had been born !

I'm sure I was affectionate—
 But in my sister's face
 There was a look of love, that claim'd
 A smile or an embrace !
 But when I raised my lip, to meet
 The pressure children prize,
 None knew the feelings of my heart—
 They spoke not in my eyes.

But, oh ! that heart too keenly felt
 The anguish of neglect ;
 I saw my sister's lovely form
 With gems and roses deck'd ;
 I did not covet them—but oft,
 When wantonly reproved,
 I envied her the privilege
 Of being so beloved.

But soon a time of triumph came,
 A time of sorrow too—
 For sickness o'er my sister's form
 Her venom'd mantle threw ;
 The features, once so beautiful,
 Now wore the hue of death,
 And former friends shrank fearfully
 From her infectious breath.

'Twas then, unwearied, day and night,
 I watch'd beside her bed,
 And fearlessly upon my breast
 I pillow'd her poor head.
 She lived—she loved me for my care !
 My grief was at an end ;
 I was a lonely being once ;
 But now I have a friend !

ON BURNING A PACKET OF LETTERS.

By Alaric A. Watts.

RELICS of love, and life's enchanted spring,
 Of hopes born, rainbow-like, of smiles and tears ;—
 With trembling hand do I unloose the string,
 Twined round the records of my youthful years.

Yet why preserve memorials of a dream,
 Too bitter-sweet to breathe of aught but pain !
 Why court fond memory for a fitful gleam
 Of faded bliss, that cannot bloom again !

The thoughts and feelings these sad relics bring Back on my heart, I would not now recall :—
 Since gentler ties around its pulses cling,
 Shall spells less hallowed hold them still in thrall ?

Can withered hopes that never came to flower,
 Match with affections long and dearly tried !
 Love, that has lived through many a stormy hour,
 Through good and ill,—and time and change defied !

Perish each record that might wake a thought
 That would be treason to a faith like this !—
 Why should the spectres of past joys be brought To fling their shadows o'er my present bliss !

Yet,—ere we part for ever,—let me pay
 A last, fond tribute to the sainted dead ;
 Mourn o'er these wrecks of passion's earlier day,
 With tears as wild as once I used to shed.

What gentle words are flashing on my eye !
 What tender truths in every line I trace !
 Confessions—penned with many a deep-drawn sigh,—
 Hopes—like the dove—with but one resting-place !

How many a feeling, long—too long—repress'd,
 Like autumn-flowers, here opened out at last !—
 How many a vision of the lonely breast
 Its cherished radiance on these leaves hath cast !

And ye, pale violets, whose sweet breath hath driven
 Back on my soul the dreams I fain would quell ;
 To whose faint perfume such wild power is given,
 To call up visions—only loved too well ;—

Ye too must perish !—Wherefore now divide
 Tributes of love—first-offerings of the heart ;—
 Gifts—that so long have slumbered side by side ;
 Tokens of feeling—never meant to part !

A long farewell :—sweet flowers, sad scrolls, adieu !
 Yes, ye shall be companions to the last :—
 So perish all that would revive anew
 The fruitless memories of the faded past !

But lo ! the flames are curling swiftly 'round
 Each fairer vestige of my youthful years ;
 Page after page that searching blaze hath found,
 Even whilst I strive to trace them through my tears.

The Hindoo widow, in a flection strong,
 Dies by her lord, and keeps her faith unbroken :—
 Thus perish all which to those wrecks belong,
 The living memory—with the lifeless token !

ADDRESS TO THE DEITY*.

By Joanna Baillie.

ALMIGHTY God! from whom our being came,
To whom it tends, blest be thy holy name!
Blest as through pillared ailes we roam
Or kneel beneath the lofty dome,
As full o'erhead and all around
Swell harmonies of long drawn sound,
While storied windows with deep tintured beam
On chiselled forms and graven pavements gleam!
Blest in the low-browed house of prayer,
Where homely pews and rafters bare
Encompass those who meekly look
Upon the cherished holy book!
Blest in the cot where on the ground
The patriarch-peasant kneels with all his family round

And oh! most blest where thy adorer stands
Within a temple not upreared by hands.
O'er-canopied by pure, ethereal blue,
On which fair clouds of white and silvery hue
In wide array with slow procession range,
And varied forms assume in endless change.
The granite peak, by storms of ages beat,
The pavement is on which he sets his feet,
And there a goodly scope surveys
Enlightened by the morning rays.
Below, distinctly marked, are seen
Fields, hamlets, towns, and woodlands green,
And then beyond, but less defined,
A sweep of hills and vales combined,
Where brooding vapours scarce betray
Some river winding on its way;
And far beyond, by distance made
A fainter line of light and shade,
While further still in distance lost,
Lie sea, and shore, and clifted coast,
A vasty circle, dim and pale,
Of mortal ken the closing veil.
In this thy Temple, fair and grand,
Doth thine adoring creature stand,
His eyes in ecstasy of wonder raising,
His glowing, throbbing heart thy goodness praising,
While tears run coursing down his cheeks
And every thrilling member speaks,
The one unuttered thought his soul containeth
In love and awe absorbed, "The Lord Omnipotent reigneth."

TO CERTAIN GOLDEN FISHES.

By Hartley Coleridge†.

RESTLESS forms of living light
Quivering on your lucid wings,
Cheating still the curious sight
With a thousand shadowings;—

* This little poem is perhaps the latest of Joanna Baillie's productions. It was sent by her (in one of her letters to the Compiler) as an original contribution to this volume. It was received too late to be inserted amongst the specimens of her genius which are given at columns 1287 to 1292.

† Son of Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

Various as the tints of even,
Gorgeous as the hues of heaven,
Reflected on your native streams
In flitting, flashing, billowy gleams.
Harmless warriors, clad in mail
Of silver breastplate, golden scale;—
Mail of Nature's own bestowing,
With peaceful radiance mildly glowing,—
Keener than the Tartar's arrow,
Sport ye in your sea so narrow.
Was the sun himself your sire?
Were ye born of vital fire?
Or of the shade of golden flowers,
Such as we fetch from eastern bowers,
To mock this murky clime of ours?
Upwards, downwards, now ye glance,
Weaving many a mazy dance;
Seeming still to grow in size
When ye would elude our eyes—
Pretty creatures! we might deem Ye were happy as ye seem,—
As gay, as gamesome, and as blithe,
As light, as loving, and as lithe,
As gladly earnest in your play,
As when ye gleam'd in fair Cathay;
And yet, since on this hapless earth
There's small sincerity in mirth,
And laughter oft is but an art
To drown the outcry of the heart:
It may be, that your ceaseless gambols,
Your wheelings, dartings, divings, rambles,
Your restless roving round and round
The circuit of your crystal bound,
Is but the task of weary pain,
An endless labour, dull and vain;
And while your forms are gaily shining,
Your little lives are inly pining!
Nay—but still I fain would dream
That ye are happy as ye seem.

ECHO AND SILENCE.

By Sir Egerton Brydges*.

Born 1762.—Died 1838.

IN eddying course when leaves began to fly,
And autumn in her lap the store to strew,
As mid wild scenes I chanced the muse to woo,
Through glens untrod and woods that frowned on high,
Two sleeping nymphs with wonder mute I spy;
And lo, she's gone!—In robe of dark green hue,
'Twas Echo from her sister Silence flew,
For quick the hunter's horn resounded to the sky!
In shade affrighted Silence melts away.
Not so her sister.—Hark! for onward still
With far-heard steps she takes her listening way,
Bounding from rock to rock, and hill to hill.
Ah, mark the merry maid in mockful play,
With thousand mimic tones the laughing forest fill!

* Sir Egerton Brydges was a very voluminous author, and wrote on a great variety of subjects, in prose and verse. His best known and most useful works were of an antiquarian character.—Compiler.

THE SOLDIER'S HOME.

By Robert Bloomfield*.

* Born 1766.—Died 1823.

My untried muse shall no high tone assume,
Nor strut in arms;—farewell my cap and plume:
Brief be my verse, a task within my power,
I tell my feelings in one happy hour;
But what an hour was that! when from the main
I reach'd this lovely valley once again!
A glorious harvest fill'd my eager sight,
Half shock'd, half waving in a flood of light;
On that poor cottage roof where I was born
The sun look'd down as in life's early morn.
I gazed around, but not a soul appear'd,
I listen'd on the threshold, nothing heard;
I call'd my father thrice, but no one came;
It was not fear or grief that shook my frame,
But an o'erpowering sense of peace and home,
Of toils gone by, perhaps of joys to come.
The door invitingly stood open wide,
I shook my dust, and set my staff aside.
How sweet it was to breathe that cooler air,
And take possession of my father's chair!
Beneath my elbow, on the solid frame,
Appear'd the rough initials of my name,
Cut forty years before!—the same old clock
Struck the same bell, and gave my heart a shock
I never can forget. A short breeze spring,
And while a sigh was trembling on my tongue,
Caught the old dangling almanacks behind,
And up they flew, like banners in the wind;
Then gently, singly, down, down, down, they went,
And told of twenty years that I had spent
Far from my native-land:—that instant came
A robin on the threshold; though so tame,
At first he look'd distrustful, almost shy,
And cast on me his coal-black stedfast eye,
And seem'd to say (past friendship to renew)
“Ah ha! old worn-out soldier, is it you?”
Through the room ranged the imprison'd humble bee,
And bomb'd, and bounced, and struggled to be free,
Dashing against the panes with sullen roar,
That threw their diamond sunlight on the floor;
That floor, clean sanded, where my fancy stray'd
O'er undulating waves the broom had made,
Reminding me of those of hideous forms
That met us as we pass'd the Cape of Storms,
Where high and loud they break, and peace comes never;
They roll and foam, and roll and foam for ever.
But here was peace, that peace which home can yield;
The grasshopper, the partridge in the field,
And ticking clock, were all at once become
The substitutes for clarion, fife, and drum.
While thus I mused, still gazing, gazing still
On beds of moss that spread the window sill,
I deem'd no moss my eyes had ever seen
Had been so lovely, brilliant, fresh, and green,
And guess'd some infant hand had placed it there,
And prized its hue, so exquisite, so rare.

* A Suffolk peasant. He went to London in 1800 and became a Shoemaker.

Feelings on feelings mingling, doubling rose,
My heart felt every thing but calm repose;
I could not reckon minutes, hours, nor years,
But rose at once, and burst into tears;
Then, like a fool, confused, sat down again,
And thought upon the past with shame and pain;
I raved at war and all its horrid cost,
And glory's quagmire, where the brave are lost.
On carnage, fire, and plunder, long I mused,
And cursed the murdering weapons I had used.

Two shadows then I saw, two voices heard,
One bespoke age, and one a child's appear'd.—
In stepp'd my father with convulsive start,
And in an instant clasp'd me to his heart.
Close by him stood a little blue-eyed maid,
And stooping to the child, the old man said,
“Come hither, Nancy, kiss me once again,
“This is your uncle Charles, come home from Spain.”
The child approach'd and with her fingers light,
Stroked my old eyes, almost deprived of sight.—
But why thus spin my tale, thus tedious be?
Happy old Soldier! what's the world to me?

SOLITUDE.

By Henry Kirke White*.

Born 1785.—Died 1806.

It is not that my lot is low
That bids the silent tear to flow;
It is not this that makes me moan,—
It is that I am all alone.

In woods and glens I love to roam,
When the tir'd hedger hies him home;
Or by the woodland pool to rest,
When pale the star looks on its breast.

Yet when the silent evening sighs,
With hallowed airs and symphonies,
My spirit takes another tone,
And sighs that it is all alone.

The autumn leaf is sear and dead,
It floats upon the water's bed;
I would not be a leaf, to die
Without recording sorrow's sigh!

The woods and winds, with sullen wail,
Tell all the same unvaried tale;
I've none to smile when I am free,
And when I sigh, to sigh with me.

Yet in my dreams a form I view,
That thinks on me, and loves me too;
I start, and when the vision's flown,
I weep that I am all alone.

* Southey's beautiful and pathetic memoir of Kirke White has given a peculiar interest to his poems. Though as the productions of a youth they were highly meritorious and full of promise; they would have been quite forgotten before this, but for Southey's generous notice.—Compiler.

TO MY CANDLE.

By Doctor John Wolcot.

(Better known as Peter Pindar.)

Born 1738.—Died 1819.

THOU lone companion of the spectred night,
 I wake amid thy friendly-watchful light,
 To steal a precious hour from lifeless sleep—
 Hark the wild uproar of the winds! and hark,
 Hell's genius roams the regions of the dark,
 And swells the thundering horrors of the deep.

From cloud to cloud the pale moon hurrying flies;
 Now blackened, and now flashing through her skies.

But all is silence here—beneath thy beam,
 I own I labour for the voice of praise—
 For who would sink in dull oblivion's stream?
 Who would not live in songs of after days?

Thus while I wondering pause o'er Shakspeare's page,
 I mark, in visions of delight the sage,
 High o'er the wrecks of man who stands sublime;
 A column in the melancholy waste
 (Its cities humbled and its glories past),
 Majestic, 'mid the solitude of time.
 Yet now to sadness let me yield the hour—
 Yes, let the tears of purest friendship shower.

I view, alas! what ne'er should die,
 A form that wakes my deepest sigh;
 A form that feels of death the leaden sleep—
 Descending to the realms of shade,
 I view a pale-eyed panting maid;
 I see the virtues o'er the favorite weep.

Ah! could the Muse's simple prayer
 Command the envied trump of Fame,
 Oblivion should Eliza spare:
 A world should echo with her name.

Art thou departing too, my trembling friend?
 Ah! draws thy little lustre to its end?
 Yes, on thy frame, Fate too shall fix her seal—
 O let me, pensive, watch thy pale decay;
 How fast that frame, so tender, wears away!
 How fast thy life the restless minutes steal!

How slender now, alas, thy thread of fire!
 Ah, falling, falling, ready to expire!
 In vain thy struggles—all will soon be o'er—
 At life thou snatchest with an eager leap:
 Now round I see thy flame so feeble creep,
 Faint, lessening, quivering, glimmering—now no
 more!

Thus shall the suns of science sink away,
 And thus of beauty fade the fairest flower—
 For where's the giant who to Time shall say
 'Destructive Tyrant, I arrest thy power?'

THE RAZOR SELLER.

(By the same.)

A FELLOW in a market town,
 Most musical, cried razors up and down,
 And offered twelve for eighteen-pence;
 Which certainly seemed wondrous cheap,
 And for the money quite a heap,
 As every man would buy, with cash and sense.

A country humpkin the great offer heard:
 Poor Hodge, who suffered by a thick, black beard,
 That seemed a shoe-brush stuck beneath his nose:
 With cheerfulness the eighteen of pence he paid,
 And proudly to himself, in whispers, said,
 "This rascal stole the razors I suppose;
 No matter if the fellow be a knave,
 Provided that the razors shave:
 It sartinly will be a monstrous prize!"

Being well lathered from a dish or tub,
 Hodge now began with grinning pain to grub,
 Just like a hedger cutting furze:
 'Twas a vile razor!—then the rest he tried—
 All were impostors—"Ah," Hodge sighed!
 "I wish my eighteen-pence were in my purse!"

In vain to chase his beard, and bring the graces,
 He cut, and dug, and winced, and stamped, and swore,
 Brought blood, and danced, blasphemed, and made
 wry faces,
 And cursed each razor's body o'er and o'er:
 His muzzle form of opposition stuff,
 Firm as a Foxite, would not lose its ruff;
 So kept it—laughing at the steel and suds:

Hodge in a passion, stretched his angry jaws,
 Vowing the direst vengeance, with clenched claws,
 On the vile cheat that sold the goods.
 "Razors! confounded dog,
 Not fit to scrape a hog!"

Hodge sought the fellow—found him, and begun—
 "Perhaps, master Razor-rogue, to you 'tis fun,
 That people flay themselves out of their lives:
 You rascal! for an hour have I been grubbing,
 Giving my scoundrel whiskers here a scrubbing,
 With razors just like oyster knives.
 Sirrah! I tell you you're a knave,
 To cry up razors that can't shave!"

"Friend," quoth the razor-man, "I am no knave:
 As for the razors you have bought
 Upon my soul I never thought
 That they would shave?"

"Not think they'd shave!" quoth Hodge, with wondering eyes,
 And voice not much unlike an Indian yell;
 "What were they made for then, you dog?" he cries:
 "Made!" quoth the fellow, with a smile—"to sell."

LINES FOR MY DAUGHTER'S HOUR-GLASS.

By John M. McCrery.

MARK the golden grains that pass
 Brightly, through this channelled glass;
 Measuring by their ceaseless fall
 Heaven's most precious gift to all!
 Busy, till its sand be done,
 See the shining current run;
 But, th' allotted numbers shed,
 Another hour of life hath fled!
 Its task perform'd, its labour past,
 Like mortal man it rests at last!
 Yet let some hand invert its frame,
 And all its powers return the same;
 Whilst any golden grains remain,
 'Twill work its little hour again.—
 But who shall turn the glass for man,
 When all his golden grains have ran?
 Who shall collect his scatter'd sand,
 Dispersed by Time's unsparing hand?
 Who gave, 'tis he alone can find,
 The awful—the eternal mind!
 Then, daughters, since this truth is plain,
 That time once gone, ne'er comes again,
 Improved bid every moment pass—
 See how the sand rolls down your glass.

THE MOSSY SEAT.

By David Moir.*

THE landscape hath not lost its look;
 Still rushes on the sparkling river;
 Nor hath the gloominess forsook
 These granite crags that frown for ever;
 Still hangs around the shadowy wood,
 Whose sounds but murmur solitude:
 The raven's plaint, the linnet's song,
 The stock-dove's coo, in grief repining,
 In mingled echoes steal along:
 The setting sun is brightly shining;
 And clouds above, and hills below,
 Are brightening with his golden glow.

It is not meet—it is not fit—
 Though Fortune all our hopes hath thwarted,
 While on the very stone I sit
 Where first we met, and last we parted,
 That absent from my mind should be
 The thought that loves and looks to thee!
 Each happy hour that we have proved,
 While love's delicious converse blended,
 As 'neath the twilight star we roved,
 Unconscious where our progress tended—
 Still brings my mind a soft relief,
 And bids it love the joys of grief!

What soothing recollections throng,
 Presenting many a mournful token,
 That heart's remembrance to prolong,
 Which then was blest, and now is broken!
 I cannot—Oh! hast thou forgot
 Our early loves—this hallowed spot!

* The poetical contributor to Blackwood's Magazine under the signature of Delta.

I almost think I see thee stand;
 I almost dream I hear thee speaking;
 I feel the pressure of thy hand;
 Thy living glance in fondness seeking—
 Here all apart—by all unseen—
 Thy form upon my arm to lean!

Tho' beauty bless the landscape still,
 Tho' woods surround, and waters lave it,
 My heart feels not the vivid thrill,
 Which long ago thy presence gave it;
 Mirth, music, friendship, have no tone
 Like that, which with thy voice hath flown!
 And Memory only now remains,
 To whisper things that once delighted:
 Still—still I love to tread these plains,
 To seek this sacred haunt benighted,
 And feel a something, sadly sweet,
 In resting on this mossy seat.

LINES WRITTEN IN AN ALBUM.

By Walter Paterson.

I CANNOT stain this snowy leaf
 Without a sigh of pensive grief!
 As musing on my days gone by,
 And those that still before me lie,
 I read a mournful emblem here,
 That few could read without a tear!
 For, as my musing eyes I cast,
 Upon the pages that are past,
 I search them all, but search in vain
 To find even one without a stain!
 But what has been, is not to be,—
 The happy future yet is free;
 Far as my forward eye can go,
 The future still is white as snow;
 So free from stains, so free from cares,
 The tainted past it half repairs!
 It is a goodly sight! but oh!
 Too well within this heart I know
 That this fair future, at the last,
 Shall be itself the tainted past.

THE SKY-LARK.

By Mrs. G. G. Richardson.

THE lark forsakes the woodland quire,
 And heavenward soars away;
 And sweeter as she rises higher,
 Her notes thro' ether stray;
 Her trembling wing—her gradual swell—
 Her solemn, joyous airs;
 Her tow'ring flight,—all plainly tell
 The errand that she bears.

Alone she travels, all alone
 She warbles unconfin'd;
 So piety ascends the throne—
 So leaves the world behind!
 Oh! if as pure of heart could I
 Her morning flight attend,
 I'd join that hermit of the sky,
 And never more descend.

THE AFRICAN CHIEF.

CHAINED in the market-place he stood,
A man of giant frame,
Amid the gathering multitude,
That shrunk to hear his name—
All stern of look and strong of limb,
His dark eye on the ground :
And silently they gazed on him,
As on a lion bound.

Vainly, but well, that chief had fought,—
He was a captive now,—
Yet pride, that fortune humbles not,
Was written on his brow.
The scars his dark broad bosom wore,
Shewed warrior true and brave ;
A prince among his tribe before,
He could not be a slave.

Then to his conqueror he spake—
“ My brother is a king :
Undo this necklace from my neck,
And take this bracelet ring ;
And send me where my brother reigns,
And I will fill thy hands
With store of ivory from the plains,
And gold dust from the sands.”

“ Not for thy ivory nor thy gold
Will I unbind thy chain :
That bloody hand shall never hold
The battle-spear again.
A price thy nation never gave,
Shall it be paid for thee :
For thou shalt be the Christian's slave,
In lands beyond the sea.”

Then wept the warrior chief, and bade
To shred his locks away ;
And, one by one, each heavy braid
Before the victor lay.
Thick were the platted locks and long,
And deftly hidden there
Shone many a wedge of gold among
The dark and crisped hair.

“ Look, feast thy greedy eye with gold
Long kept for sorest need ;
Take it—thou askest sums untold,
And say that I am freed.
Take it—my wife the long, long day
Weeps by the cocoa-tree,
And my young children leave their play,
And ask in vain for me.”

“ I take thy gold—but I have made
Thy fetters fast and strong,
And ween that by the cocoa shade
Thy wife will wait thee long.”
Strong was the agony that shook
The captive's frame to hear,
And the proud meaning of his look
Was changed to mortal fear.

5 E 2

His heart was broken—crazed his brain—
At once his eye grew wild—
He struggled fiercely with his chain,
Whispered, and wept, and smiled ;
Yet wore not long those fatal bands,
And once, at shut of day,
They drew him forth upon the sands,
The foul hyena's prey.

THE TALL GENTLEMAN'S APOLOGY.

UPBRAID me not :—I never swore eternal love to thee,
For thou art only five feet high, and I am six feet three ;
I wonder, dear, how you supposed that I could look so
low,
There's many a one can tie a knot, who, cannot fix
a beau.

Besides, you must confess, my love, the bargain scarcely fair, [a pair ;
For never could we make a match, altho' we made Marriage, I know, makes one of two ; but here's the horrid bore. [four.
My friends declare, if you are one, that I, at least, am

'Tis true the moralists have said, that Love has got no
eyes,
But why should all my sighs be heaved for one who has no size ?
And on our wedding day I'm sure I'd leave you in the lurch,
For you never saw a steeple, dear, in the inside of a church.

'Tis usual for a wife to take her husband by the arm,
But pray excuse me should I hint a sort of fond alarm,
That when I offered you my arm, that happiness to beg,
Your highest effort, dear, would be to take me by the leg.

I do admit I wear a glass, because my sight's not good,
But were I always quizzing you, it might be counted
rude,
And though I use a concave lens—by all the gods,
I hope
My wife will ne'er look up to me through a Herschel's telescope.

Then fare thee well, my gentle one ! I ask no parting kiss,
I must not break my back to gain so exquisite a bliss,
Nor will I weep lest I should hurt so delicate a flower,—
The tears that fall from such a height would be a thunder-shower.

Farewell ! and pray don't drown yourself in a bason
or a tub,
For that would be a sore disgrace to all the Six Feet
Club ;
But if you ever love again love on a smaller plan,
For why extend to six feet three a life that's but a span !

ADDRESS TO THE EGYPTIAN MUMMY IN BELZONI'S EXHIBITION.

By Horace Smith.*

AND thou hast walked about—how strange a story !—
In Thebes's streets three thousand years ago !
When the Memnonium was in its glory,
And Time had not begun to overthrow
Those temples, palaces, and piles stupendous,
Of which the very ruins are tremendous !

Speak, for thou long enough hast acted Dummy,
Thou hast a tongue—come—let us hear its tune !
Thou'rt standing on thy legs, above-ground, Mummy !
Revisiting the glimpses of the moon ;
Not like thin ghosts or disembodied creatures,
But with thy bones, and flesh, and limbs and features,

Tell us—for doubtless thou canst recollect,—
To whom should we assign the Sphinx's fame ?
Was Cheops, or Cephrenés architect
Of either Pyramid that bears his name ?
Is Pompey's Pillar really a misnomer ?
Had Thebes a hundred gates as sung by Homer ?

Perhaps thou wert a Mason, and forbidden,
By oath, to tell the mysteries of thy trade,—
Then say, what secret melody was hidden
In Memnon's statue, which at sunrise played ?
Perhaps thou wert a Priest—if so, my struggles
Are vain,—for priestcraft never owns its juggles.

Perchance that very hand, now pinioned flat,
Hath hob-a-nobbed with Pharaoh, glass to glass ;
Or dropped a halfpenny in Homer's hat ;
Or doffed thine own to let Queen Dido pass :
Or held, by Solomon's own invitation,
A torch at the great Temple's dedication.

I need not ask thee if that hand, when armed,
Has any Roman soldier mauled and knuckled ?
For thou wert dead, and buried, and embalmed,
Ere Romulus and Remus had been suckled :—
Antiquity appears to have begun
Long after thy primeval race was run.

Thou could'st develope, if that withered tongue
Might tell us what those sightless orbs have seen,
How the world looked when it was fresh and young,
And the great Deluge still had left it green !—
Or was it then so old that History's pages
Contained no record of its early ages ?

Still silent ! Incommunicative elf !
Art sworn to secrecy ? then keep thy vows ;
But, prythee, tell us something of thyself,—
Reveal the secrets of thy prison-house ;
Since in the world of spirits, thou hast slumbered,
What hast thou seen—what strange adventures numbered ?

Since first thy form was in this box extended,
We have, above-ground, seen some strange mutations ;—

* One of the authors of the "Rejected Addresses," a collection of highly humorous and clever imitations of the poets of the day.

The Roman Empire has begun and ended ;
New worlds have risen,—we have lost old nations ;
And countless kings have into dust been humbled,
While not a fragment of thy flesh has crumbled.

Didst thou not hear the pother o'er thy head
When the great Persian Conqueror, Cambyses,
Marched armies o'er thy tomb, with thundering tread,
O'erthrew Osiris, Orus, Apis, Isis,
And shook the Pyramids with fear and wonder,
When the gigantic Memnon fell asunder ?

If the tomb's secrets may not be confessed,
The nature of thy private life unfold :—
A heart hath throbbed beneath that leathern breast,
And tears adown that dusty cheek have rolled.
Have children climbed these knees, and kissed that face ?

What was thy name, and station, age, and race ?

Statue of flesh !—Immortal of the dead !
Impersishable type of evanescence !
Posthumous man, who quit'st thy narrow bed,
And standest undecayed within our presence,
Thou wilt hear nothing till the Judgment morning,
When the great Trump shall thrill thee with its warning.

Why should this worthless tegument endure,
If its undying guest be lost for ever ?
O let us keep the soul embalmed and pure
In living virtue, that when both must sever,
Although corruption may our frame consume,
The immortal spirit in the skies may bloom.

THE FAIRY DANCE.

Addressed to a Little Girl.

By Mrs. G. G. Richardson.

THE fairies are dancing—how nimbly they bound !
They flit o'er the grass tops, they touch not the ground—
Their kirtles of green are with diamonds bedight,
All glittering and sparkling beneath the moon-light.

Hark, hark to their music ! how silvery and clear !
'Tis surely the flower-bells that ringing I hear ?
The lazy wing'd moth and the grasshopper wakes,
And the field mouse peeps out and their revel partakes.

How gently they trip it !—how happy are they,
Who pass all their moments in frolic and play,
Who rove where they list, without sorrows or cares,
And laugh at the fetters mortality wears !

But where have they vanish'd ? a cloud's on the moon—
I'll hie to the spot—they 'll be seen again soon !
I hasten—'tis lighter—and what do I view !
The fairies were grasses, the diamonds were dew !

And thus do the sparkling illusions of youth
Beguide and allure, and we take them for truth—
Too happy are they who the juggle unshroud
Ere the hint to inspect them, be brought by a cloud.

ODE TO A LEAFLESS TREE IN JUNE.

By *Sir Lytton Bulwer.

DESOLATE Tree, why are thy branches bare?
What hast thou done,
To win strange winter from the summer air,
Frost from the sun?

Thou wert not churlish, in thy palmier year,
Unto the herd;
Tenderly gav'st thou shelter to the deer,
Home to the bird.

And ever, once, the earliest of the grove,
Thy smiles were gay;
Opening thy blossoms with the haste of love,
To the young May.

Then did the bees, and all the insect wings,
Around thee gleam:
Feaster and darling of the gilded things
That dwell i' th' beam.

Thy liberal course, poor prodigal, is sped,
How lonely now!
How bird and bee, late parasites, have fled
Thy leafless bough!

Tell me, sad tree, why are thy branches bare?
What hast thou done,
To win strange winter from the summer air,
Frost from the sun?

"Never," replied that forest-hermit lone,
(O'd truth and endless!)

"Never for evil done, but fortune flown,
Are we left friendless."

"Yet wholly, nor for winter, nor for storm, Doth Love depart:

We are not all forsaken, till the worm
Creeps to the heart!

"Ah! nought without—within thee, if decay—
Can heal or hurt thee!

Nor boots it, if thy heart itself betray,
Who may desert thee!"

SONNET TO MINERVA.

By J. A. St. John†.

STERN Maid of Heaven, protectress of the wise,
Why didst thou e'er forsake Athena's towers?
Why from her mart of thought, her olive bowers,
Didst thou avert thy lore-inspiring eyes?
Is it that fickleness usurps the skies;
Or that all states have their unhappy hours;
Or that the Gods withdraw their sacred dowers,
When man from virtue's narrow pathway flies?
Be as it may, return thee to the spot;
Think of no ancient wrongs, O Goddess, now.
Be all her failings—be thy wrath forgot;
And what thou canst for fallen Athena show.
Extend thy ægis o'er thy ruined fane,
And give its ancient glory back again.

SONG.

By R. M. Milnes.

I WANDERED by the brook-side,
I wandered by the mill,
I could not hear the brook flow,
The noisy wheel was still.
There was no burr of grasshopper,
No chirp of any bird—
But the beating of my own heart
Was all the sound I heard.

I sat beneath the elm-tree,
I watched the long, long shade,
And as it grew still longer,
I did not feel afraid;
For I listened for a footfall,
I listened for a word—
But the beating of my own heart
Was all the sound I heard.

He came not—no, he came not,
The night came on alone,
The little stars sat one by one,
Each on his golden throne;
The evening air past by my cheek,
The leaves above were stirred,—
But the beating of my own heart
Was all the sound I heard.

Fast, silent tears were flowing,
When something stood behind,
A hand was on my shoulder,
I knew its touch was kind;
It drew me nearer—nearer—
We did not speak a word,
But the breathing of our own hearts
Was all the sound we heard.

A PRAYER.

By *William Beckford.

LIKE the low murmur of the secret stream,
Which, through dark alders, winds it shaded way,
My suppliant voice is heard:—Ah! do not deem
That on vain toys I throw my hours away.

In the recesses of the forest vale,—
On the wild mountain,—on the verdant sod,
Where the fresh breezes of the morn prevail,—
I wander lonely, communing with God.

When the faint sickness of a wounded heart,
Creeps in cold shudderings through my sinking
frame,
I turn to thee,—that holy peace impart
Which soothes the invokers of thy awful name.

O all-pervading Spirit!—Sacred beam!
Parent of life and light!—Eternal Power!
Grant me, through obvious clouds, one transient gleam
Of thy bright essence in my dying hour!

* Author of Vatheck.

STANZAS.

By Oliver Richardson.

METHINKS I see before my eyes
A scene of other days,—
The green hills from the waves arise,
The sparkling waves, the azure skies,
The sun's enlivening rays :

Methinks I feel the cooling breeze,
Laden with rich perfume,
Come gently breathing o'er the seas,
Wafting the offerings of trees
Of ev'ry radiant bloom.

The saddest spirit had been gay
That lovely scene to view ;
The wish'd-for port before us lay,
And, like a sea-bird, o'er the bay
Our gallant vessel flew.

With merry hearts and ardent eyes
Their work the seamen ply ;
As one by one the landmarks rise,
Each wooded point behind us flies,
And friends and home are nigh

All—all breath'd joy, when hark ! a cry,
A splash, a plunge, a scream,—
A dying shriek of agony,—
And one whose heart but now beat high,
Has vanish'd like a dream !

In vain the hurrying sailors rush'd
Their comrade's life to save ;
One moment—and his cry was hush'd,
One moment—and the wave that gush'd
Had settled o'er his grave.

We shudder'd at his sudden doom
So near his native shore :—
Strange contrast to our deepening gloom,
The treacherous billows o'er his tomb
Smiled sweetly as before !

FAME—THE SYMBOL AND PROOF OF IMMORTALITY.

By T. Noon Telford.*

THE names that slow Oblivion have defied,
And passionate Ambition's wildest shocks,
Stand in lone grandeur, like eternal rocks,
To cast broad shadows o'er the silent tide
Of Time's unebbing flood, whose waters glide,
To ponderous darkness from their secret spring,
And, bearing on each transitory thing,
Leave those old monuments in loneliest pride.
There stand they—fortresses uprear'd by man,
Whose earthly frame is mortal ; symbols high
Of life unchanging,—strength that cannot die ;
Proofs that our nature is not of a span,
But of immortal essence, and allied
To life and joy and love unperishing.

INCIDENT IN THE LIFE OF MILTON.

By Robert Montgomery.*

THERE is a tale—and let it live
Such life as fond romance can give,
That once as slumbering, Milton lay
In umbrage from the noon-tide ray,
Beneath the twilight of a tree
That arched its waving canopy,—
A maiden saw his sleeping face,
And spell-bound with its beauteous grace
Her wonder in sweet song expressed,
And placed it on the poet's breast ;
" If eyes when shut the heart can take,
How bright their victory when awake !"
Oh ! who can tell what beauty flowed
From feelings by such words bestowed ;—
The eye of his enchanted thought
From hues of Nature's heaven was wrought
And she of Paradise the queen,
Embodied what his soul had seen.

SONNET ON PARTING WITH HIS BOOKS.

By William Roscoe†.

Born 1752.—Died 1831.

As one, who destined from his friends to part,
Regrets his loss, but hopes again, erewhile
To share their converse, and enjoy their smile,
And tempers, as he may, affliction's dart ;
Thus, loved associates, chiefs of elder art,
Teachers of wisdom, who could once beguile
My tedious hours, and lighten every toil,—
I now resign you ! Nor with fainting heart ;
For pass a few short years, or days, or hours,
And happier seasons may their dawn unfold,
And all your sacred fellowship restore ;
When, freed from earth, unlimited its powers,
Mind shall with mind direct communion hold,
And kindred spirits meet to part no more.

SONNET TO AN INFIDEL.

By J. Gray.

ALL is in change,—yet there is nothing lost :
The dew becomes the essence of the flower
Which feeds the insect of the sunny hour,—
Now leaf, now pinton ;—though the hills were tost
By the wild whirlwinds, like the summer dust,
Would not an atom perish ;—Nature's power
Knows not annihilation, and her dower
Is universal Fitness never crost.
Is all eternal, save the mind of man,—
The masterpiece and glory of the whole,
The wonder of creation ?—is a span
To limit the duration of the soul—
To drop ere its career is well begun,
Like a proud steed far distant from the goal ?

 So glared he when at Agincourt in wrath he turned to

 O'er Longleat's towers, o'er Cranbourne's oaks, the

 He roused the shepherds of Stonehenge, the rangers

 hurrying feet,
 And the broad stream of flags and pikes dashed down
 each roaring street : [d,
 And broader still became the blaze, and louder still the LILLA.

By Cornelius W'ebbe.*.

OH Lilla is a lovely lass
 As ever man did woo !
 Her eyes all eyes on earth surpass
 They kill and cure you too !
 Her winsome waist, however laced,
 A hand might span it all ;—
 Her shoulders fair, lit by her hair,
 Whose yellow tresses fall
 Like sunbeams shed upon a bed
 Of lilies in mid June,
 Or golden light in summer night
 Soft streaming from the moon ;—
 There are some charms which moral men
 May behold with careless eye ;
 I, who am devoutest then,
 Love them to idolatry !

Her ruddy lips, like scarlet hips,
 The balmy breath between ;
 Her soft sweet tones, who hears them owns
 The music which they mean ;
 Her hands and arms have each their charms ;
 Her nimble-stepping feet,
 The very ground loves their light sound
 Soft as her bosom's beat ;—
 Her winsome waist—her shoulders, graced
 With sunny showers of hair—
 Her voice how sweet ! her dancing feet,
 Her face, like heaven's, fair ;—
 These are the charms which moral men
 May behold with careless eye ;
 I, who am devoutest then
 Love them to idolatry .

HYMN TO THE FLOWERS.

By Horace Smith.

DAY stars ! that ope your eyes with man, to twinkle
 From rainbow galaxies of earth's creation,
 And dew-drops on her lonely altars sprinkle,
 As a libation,—

Ye matin worshippers ! who bending lowly,
 Before the uprisen sun, God's lidless eye,
 Throw from your chalices a sweet and holy Incense on high,—

Ye bright Mosaics that with storied beauty,
 The floor of Nature's temple tessellate,
 What numerous emblems of instructive duty,
 Your forms create !

'Neath cloister'd boughs each floral bell that swing-
 eth,
 And tolls its perfume on the passing air,
 Makes Sabbath in the fields and ever ringeth,
 A call to prayer.

Not to the domes where crumbling arch and column
 Attest the feebleness of mortal hand,
 But to that fane most catholic and solemn
 Which God hath plann'd.

* Author of "Lyric Leaves"—"Glances at Life"—"The man about Town," &c.

To that Cathedral boundless as our wonder,
 Whose quenchless lamps the sun and moon supply,
 Its quire the winds and waves, its organ thunder,
 Its dome the sky.

There as in solitude and shade I wander,
 Thro' the green shades, or stretch'd upon the sod
 Awed by the silence, reverently ponder
 The ways of God,—

Your voiceless lips, O Flowers ! are living preachers,
 Each cup a pulpit, every leaf a book,
 Supplying to my fancy numerous teachers,
 From loneliest nook.

Floral apostles ! that in dewy splendour,
 "Weep without woe, and blush without a crime,"
 Oh ! may I deeply learn, and ne'er surrender,
 Your lore sublime.

"Thou wert not, Solomon ! in all thy glory,
 Array'd," the lilies say, "in robes like our's,
 How vain thy grandeur ! Ah ! how transitory
 Are human flowers !"

In the sweet scented pictures, heavenly artist !
 With which thou paintest nature's wide-spread hall,
 What a delightful lesson thou impartest
 Of love to all !

Not useless are ye, Flowers ! tho' made for pleasure ;
 Blooming o'er field and wave, by day and night,
 From every source your sanction bids me treasure
 Harmless delight.

Ephemeral sages ! what instructors hoary
 For such a world of thought could furnish scope ?
 Each fading calyx a memento mori
 Yet fount of hope.

Posthumous glories !—angel-like collection !
 Upraised from seed or bulb interred in earth,
 Ye are to me a type of resurrection
 And second birth.

Wee I, O God ! in churchless lands remaining,
 Far from all voice of teachers and divines,
 My soul would find in flowers of thy ordaining,
 Priests, sermons, shrines !

THE WOODEN WALLS OF ENGLAND.

By the Rev. C. Strong.

YE sacred arks of Liberty ! that float
 Where Tamar's waters spread their bosom wide,
 That seem, with towering stern and rampart side,
 Like antique castles girt with shining moat ;
 Should War the signal give with brazen throat,
 No more recumbent here in idle pride,
 Your rapid powers would cleave the foaming tide,
 And to the nations speak in thundering note.
 Thus in the firmament serene and deep,
 When summer clouds the earth are hanging o'er
 And all their mighty masses seem asleep,
 To execute Heaven's wrath and judgments sore,
 From their dark wombs the sudden lightnings leap,
 And vengeful thunders peal along the shore !

Born 1775.—Died 1811.

ODE TO AN INDIAN GOLD COIN.

Written in Chérécál, Malabar.

SLAVE of the dark and dirty mine !
 What vanity has brought thee here ?
 How can I love to see thee shine
 So bright, whom I have bought so dear ?—
 The tent-ropes flapping lone I hear
 For twilight-converse, arm in arm :
 The jackal's shriek bursts on mine ear
 When mirth and music went to charm.

By Chérécál's dark wandering streams,
 Where cane-tufts shadow all the wild,
 Sweet visions haunt my waking dreams
 Of Teviot lov'd while still a child,
 Of castled rocks stupendous piled
 By Esk or Eden's classic vale,
 Where loves of youth and friendships smil'd,
 Uncensur'd by thee, vile yellow slave !

Fade, day-dreams sweet, from memory fade !—
 The perish'd bliss of youth's first prime
 That once so bright on fancy play'd,
 Revives no more in after-time.
 Far from my sacred natal clime,
 I haste to an untimely grave ;
 The daring thoughts that soar'd sublime
 Are sunk in ocean's southern wave.

Slave of the mine ! thy yellow light
 Gleams baleful as the tumb-fire drear.—
 A gentle vision comes by night
 My lonely widow'd heart to cheer :
 Her eyes are dim with many a tear,
 That once were guiding stars to mine :
 Her fond heart throbs with many a fear !—
 I cannot bear to see thee shine.

For thee, for thee, vile yellow slave,
 I left a heart that lov'd me true !
 I cross'd the tedious ocean-wave,
 To roam in climes unkind and new.
 The cold wind of the stranger blew
 Chill on my wither'd heart :—the grave
 Dark and untimely met my view—
 And all for thee, vile yellow slave !

Ha ! com'st thou now so late to mock
 A wanderer's banish'd heart forlorn,
 Now that his frame the lightning shock
 Of sun-rays tipt with death has borne !
 From love, from friendship, country, torn,
 To memory's fond regrets the prey,
 Vile slave, thy yellow dross I scorn !—
 Go mix thee with thy kindred clay !

REGINALD HEBER*.

Born 1794.—Died 1835.

AN EVENING WALK IN BENGAL.

OUR task is done ! on Gunga's breast
 The sun is sinking down to rest ;
 And moored beneath the tamarind bough,
 Our bark has found its harbour now.
 With furled sail and painted side,
 Behold the tiny frigate ride.
 Upon her deck, 'mid charcoal gleams,
 The Moslems' savoury supper steams,
 While all apart, beneath the wood,
 The Hindoo cooks his simpler food.

Come walk with me the jungle through ;
 If yonder hunter told us true,
 Far off, in desert dank and rude,
 The tiger holds his solitude ;
 Nor (taught by secret charm to shun
 The thunders of the English gun,)
 A dreadful guest but rarely seen,
 Returns to scare the village green.
 Come boldly on ! no venom'd snake
 Can shelter in so cool a brake :
 Child of the sun ! he loves to lie
 'Mid nature's embers parched and dry,
 Where o'er some tower in ruin laid,
 The peepul spreads its haunted shade,
 Or round a tomb his scales to wreathe,
 Fit warder in the gate of death !

Come on ! yet pause ! behold us now
 Beneath the bamboo's arched bough,
 Where gemming off that sacred gloom,
 Glows the geranium's scarlet bloom,
 And winds our path through many a bower
 Of fragrant tree and giant flower ;
 The cuba's crimson pomp displayed
 O'er the broad plantain's humbler shade,
 And dusk anana's prickly blade :
 While o'er the brake, so wild and fair,
 The betel waves his crest in air.
 With pendant train and rushing wings,
 Aloft the gorgeous peacock springs ;
 And he, the bird of hundred dyes,
 Whose plumes the dames of Ava prize.
 So rich a shade, so green a sod,
 Our English fairies never trod ;
 Yet who in Indian bower has stood,
 But thought on England's "good green wood ?"
 And blessed beneath the palmy shade,
 Her hazel and her hawthorn glade,
 And breathed a prayer, (how oft in vain !)
 To gaze upon her oaks again ?

A truce to thought ! the jackal's cry
 Resounds like sylvan revelry ;
 And through the trees, yon falling ray
 Will scantily serve to guide our way.

* Author of "Palestine, a Prize Poem," &c. &c.

Yet, mark ! as fade the upper skies,
 Each thicket opes ten thousand eyes.
 Before, beside us, and above,
 The fire-fly lights his lamp of love,
 Retreating, chasing, sinking, soaring,
 The darkness of the copse exploring ;
 While to this cooler air confest,
 The broad Dhatura bares her breast,
 Of fragrant scent, and virgin white,
 A pearl around the locks of night !
 Still as we pass in softened hum,
 Along the breezy valleys come
 The village song, the horn, the drum.
 Still as we pass, from bush and briar,
 The shrill cigala strikes his lyre ;
 And, what is she whose liquid strain
 Thrills through yon copse of sugar-cane ?
 I know that soul-entrancing swell !
 It is,—it must be,—Philomel !
 Enough, enough, the rustling trees
 Announce a shower upon the breeze,—
 The flushes of the summer sky
 Assume a deeper, ruddier dye ;
 Yon lamp that trembles on the stream,
 From forth our cabin sheds its beam ;
 And we must early sleep to find
 Betimes the morning's healthy wind.
 But O ! with thankful hearts confess,
 Ev'n here there may be happiness ;
 And He, the bounteous Sire, has given
 His peace on earth, his hope of heaven !

LINES WRITTEN TO MY WIFE ;
While on a visit to Upper India.

If thou wert by my side, my love ! how fast would evening fail
 In green Bengala's palmy grove, listening the nightingale !
 If thou, my love ! wert by my side, my babies at my knee,
 How gaily would our pinnace glide o'er Gunga's mimic sea !
 I miss thee at the dawning gray, when, on our deck
 reclined,
 In careless ease my limbs I lay, and woo the cooler
 wind.
 I miss thee when by Gunga's stream my twilight
 steps I guide,
 But most beneath the lamp's pale beam, I miss thee
 from my side.
 I spread my books, my pencil try, the lingering noon
 to cheer,
 But miss thy kind approving eye, thy meek attentive ear.
 But when of morn and eve* the star beholds me on my knee,
 I feel, though thou art distant far, thy prayers ascend
 for me.
 Then on ! Then on ! where duty leads, my course be onward still,
 On broad Hindostan's sultry meads, o'er black Al-morah's hill.

That course, nor Delhi's kingly gates, nor mild
 Malwah detain,
 For sweet the bliss us both awaits, by yonder western main.
 Thy towers, Bombay, gleam bright, they say, across the dark blue sea,
 But never were hearts so light and gny, as then shall meet in thee !

R. H. RATTRAY*.

SEETABULDEE :

On the splendid charge made on its plain, by the 6th Regiment of Bengal Cavalry, November 27, 1817.

WHEN Greece her lofty themes proclaim'd for verse,
 And Fame bade Genius Valour's feats rehearse ;
 When God-like heroes led, in fearless pride,
 Her sons to conquest, and the world defied ;
 When gods themselves forsook their thrones on high,
 To strive with mortals, here, for victory ;
 When Love and Beauty o'er the willing soul,
 In bleuded influence, held their soft control ;
 When Friendship on the heart, with hallowed breath,
 Breathed its pure essence, changeless e'en in death ;
 When every passion wore a deeper tone,
 And earth in arts and arms, celestial, shone ;
 Then rose the song of triumph, heaven-inspired ;
 Thrill'd every nerve ; and every bosom fired ;
 And youthful warriors, to the joyous strain,
 Rush'd forth as rivals to the mighty slain :
 Eager, as louder still each passion flow'd,
 To barter life for what was there bestow'd.

How changed, alas !—Though glory's equal rays
 Still shed the lustre of departed days ;
 Though, mid a nation's tears he died to save,
 The patriot-victor finds an honor'd grave ;
 No breast, responsive, owns the poet's fire ;
 No ready minstrel tunes the slacken'd lyre ;
 Hush'd are the chords ; no master-hand is raised
 To sound the feat by countless millions praised :
 The notes which, once, had lent their magic strain,
 Slumber, forgotten—ne'er to wake again.

* Mr. Rattray is perhaps the eldest of our living British Indian Poets. He is the author of "The Exile and other Poems." In these specimens of British Indian Poetry I confine myself entirely to those writers who have published their works in a collected form, for had I included the miscellaneous productions of the occasional contributors to our local literary periodicals, in my desire to do justice to all, I should hardly have known where to stop. I am fully conscious of the awkwardness and delicacy of my task, and especially as I have to make way, a few pages further on, for my own verses, which I have not done without an inward struggle and much irresolution. Had I omitted them I should have broken the unity of my plan and exposed myself to a charge of mock modesty, while in inserting them I am perhaps equally exposed to the charge of real vanity. I should have given only a single specimen, but I could not hit upon one that I was willing to be wholly judged by, and have therefore by a little variety given myself a better chance with the reader. I have not invariably chosen the best of each writer's productions, because I limited myself to the poems that were either wholly oriental in character, or bore some allusion to the thoughts or feelings peculiar to the Indian Exile. It is on this account that I am able to give but one brief specimen of Mr. Rattray's talent, for with the exception of his principal poem which is far too long for insertion here, the above is the only poem in his volume that has an Eastern colouring.—Compiler.

Oh, for an aiding voice from heaven ! to give
 To ages yet unborn, and bid them live,
 Heroes, as now, for ever—this tried band—
 These dauntless spirits of my native land !
 To stamp their names where emulation's eye
 Should hail them, deathless still in bravery ;
 And brighten to the thought—' Some future day,
 There too shall mine as proud a meed display '—
 —But vain the wish : no longer lives the hour
 When inspiration fell in heavenly power.
 Vain, now, each prayer : no god attention lends ;
 No breath inspires ; no aiding voice descends !

Yet, while this bosom heaves to that which, now,
 Bids every pulse in quicken'd throbbing flow ;
 While grateful memory turns, and views again
 The matchless scene which graced that battle-plain ;
 Spurn not in scorn, though rude and void of art.
 E'en this poor offering from a greeting heart !
 'Tis admiration's tribute, pure, from one
 Who knows you only by the deeds you've done :
 As saviours mid despair : whose daring hand
 Heedless of numbers, met destruction's brand ;
 Britons, whose names, like stars in India's sky,
 Are shinned in glory, and should never die !

THE GANGES.

Addressed to a Lady.

GUNGA, ere yet I cease to glide
 Along thy broad and stately tide,
 Assist my verse that I may pay
 The tribute of a friendly lay
 To one who flattering asks my strain,
 And was not formed to ask in vain.

They know thee not who of thee deem
 As of a dull industrious stream,
 Toiling along through mud and sand
 To scatter fatness o'er the land,
 In slime and soil that well may rear
 The double harvest of the year.
 But all unfitting to supply
 A prospect dear to Fancy's eye.

It is not thus ; and though thy wave
 Expansive be not doomed to lave
 Such fairy bowers, as beauteous Wye
 In crystal course runs smiling by ;
 Or such luxuriant hills as slane
 Along the borders of the Rhine ;
 Yet unto all, benignant Heaven
 Their own peculiar charm has given ;
 And upon Gunga's ample breast
 The signet is alike imprest,
 That manifests the will divine
 Ever in nature to combine
 The fair and good, and use and grace,
 For all the haunts of human race.

Vast as a sea the Ganges flows,
 And fed by Himalaya's snows,

* Author of the Mégha Dûta or Cloud Messenger, (a translation from the Sanscrit,) and of various other Oriental publications, chiefly translations.

Or rushing rains, with giant force
 Unwearied runs its fated course ;
 The banks that skirt its lengthened way
 Boundless variety display ;
 The mural height, the level green,
 The dangerous rock, the dark ravine,
 The barren sand, the fertile mound
 With maze of flowery thicket crowned.
 The cheerful lawn, or frowning glade,
 Embrowned by overhanging shade :
 The spacious plain, that waving corn,
 Orchards, or fragrant groves adorn ;
 Whilse towns and hamlets intervene
 And gild with life the changing scene.

But nature's chiefest bounties fall
 To thy productive fields, Bengal.
 It is not that the mountains rise
 Here as a pathway to the skies—
 Nor desert spreads its dreary tract—
 Nor foams the thundering cataract—
 Nor gloomy forest stretches, where
 The lion prowls or lurks the bear—
 Nor angry ocean raves and roars
 In tempest on the rocky shores—
 Though e'en of these thy wide extent
 Some awful glimpses doth present—
 But thine own honours fairest show
 Where Bhagirathi's waters flow,
 In many a rich and lovely scene,
 Invested with unfading green,
 That as revolving seasons run
 Still bids defiance to the Sun.
 Upon the margin of the river
 The leafy grove is verdant ever.
 Dark is the Mango's foliage spread ;
 Erect the tall Palm lifts its head ;
 Broad the Banana waves and bright ;
 Graceful the Bambu bends and light ;
 Boiling and black the billows flow
 The wide spread Indian fig below,
 Whose scion branches, many and vast,
 Far from the mighty parent cast,
 Above the wave, extend their shade
 In columned arch and long arcade.
 And here, by native faith revered,
 The Peepul's twisted trunk is reared.
 Though from the base, exposed and bare,
 The loosened soil the current tear,
 The tree its roots fantastic flings,
 And to the bank reluctant clings,
 Till all is gone—when low it lies,
 A victim to the wave, and dies—
 Like some fond heart, when stern decay
 The heart it beats for, rends away ;
 Whilst hope the slenderest stay supplies,
 It still upon that stay relies,
 Till even hope sustain no more,
 And life and love at once are o'er,
 The only solace left to share
 The sentence that inflicts despair.

Nor want we animation—rife
 Is all around, with busy life.

Upon the bosom of the tide
 Vessels of every fabric ride.
 The fisher's skiff, the light canoe
 That from a single trunk they hew ;
 The snuke and peacock modelled boat
 In Eastern pageant sent afloat ;
 The heavy barge—the ponderous bark
 Huge lumbering like another ark :
 The Bujra broad, the Bholia trim,
 Or Pinnaces that gallant swim
 With favouring breeze—or dull and slow
 Against the heady current go ;
 Creeping along the bank where pace ●
 The crew—a strange amphibious race,
 From morn to eve who never tire,
 Plodding through bush, and brake, and briar ;
 Now wading mid-deep in the mud,
 Now plunging breast-high in the flood ;
 Yet as they move, the merry laugh,
 And frequent frolic, lighten half
 Their labour, till the day expires,
 When gleam along the shore the fires
 With which contented they prepare,
 Their single meal of frugal fare ;
 Then to repose, at dawn again
 To brave the sun, and wind, and rain.

Close to the marge the cattle brouse.
 Or trail the rudely fashioned ploughs.
 The buffalo, his sides to cool,
 Stands buried in the marshy pool.
 The wild duck nestles in the sedge :
 The crane stands patient on the edge,
 Watching to seize its finny prey ;
 Whilst high the skylark wings its way,
 And in the shadow of a cloud,
 Warbles its song—distinct and loud,
 Though far removed from human eye,
 The songster sails the upper sky.
 Scattered across the teeming plain
 In groups the peasants glean the grain,
 The sickle ply, or wield the hoe,
 Or seed for future harvests sow.
 Some burthened, with their homely ware
 Journey to village Háth or fair,
 And some suspend their toils to mark
 Inquisitive the passing bark.

But most where to the river leads
 The Ghát, or beaten path proceeds,
 A never-ending train collects
 Of every caste, and age, and sex.
 Grave in the tide the Brahman stands,
 And folds his cord, or twirls his hands,
 And tells his beads, and all unheard
 Mutters a solemn mystic word.
 With reverence the Sudra dips,
 And fervently the current sips,
 That to his humbler hopes conveys
 A future life of happier days.
 But chief do India's simple daughters
 Assemble in these hallowed waters,
 With vase of classic model laden,
 Like Grecian girl or Tuscan maiden,

Collecting thus their urns to fill
 From gushing fount or trickling rill ;
 And still with pious fervour they
 To Gunga veneration pay,
 And with pretenceless rite prefer
 The wishes of their hearts to her.
 The maid or matron, as she throws
Champuc or lotus, Bél or rose,
 Or sends the quivering light afloat
 In shallow cup or paper boat,
 Prays for a parent's peace and wealth,
 Prays for a child's success and health,
 For a fond husband breathes a prayer,
 For progeny their loves to share,
 For what of good on earth is given
 To lowly life, or hoped in Heaven.

And still in quick succession start
 Village and hamlet ; town and mart,
 And Ghats that to the stream descend,
 And temples where the votaries bend
 In homage unto stones and flowers,
 Or to less offensive powers.
 And hark, the sounds of horn and drum
 Along the river fitful come,
 And cymbal's clang and trumpet's wail
 Are mellowed by the wafting gale.
 'Tis Durga's festival, and hers
 The rites—and now her worshippers
 Bring forth the goddess—to aud fro,
 The bands in solemn pageant row,
 Hymning her praises, as they sweep
 The populous stream ; till in the deep
 They clamorous toss at set of sun
 The idol—and the rite is done.

Such are the scenes the Ganges shows,
 As to the sea it rapid flows ;
 And all who love the works to scan
 Of nature, or the thoughts of man,
 May here unquestionably find
 Pleasure and profit for the mind.
 And if the young and gentle friend,
 To whom this faithful sketch I send,
 Were here, her livelier glance would snatch
 Many a gleam I fail to catch.
 The beauties of the Ganges then
 Would meet with justice from her pen ;
 Nor would her pencil fail to trace
 In living truth each pictured grace ;
 And well her taste would thus redeem
 The fame of this majestic stream.

THE INDIAN DAY.

Dawn.

Now come the delicate sighs of the soft gale,
 First breath of dawn, the morn's sweet harbinger,
 Which, as a herald, still precedes the pale,
 Calm, silvery-mantled day-break.—There's a stir
 Of life amongst the dewy opening flowers,
 The hum of insects, and the ceaseless whirl

* Author of "The Draught of Immortality and other Poems."

Of their light wings innumeros—Gem-like showers
Fall from the rustling leaves of waving trees,
While, in the west, the last star rolls away,
Yet lingeringly, as lovers part at day
From 'neath their ladies' lattice—The cool breeze
Creeps on, as slumber steals o'er hearts at ease,
Fanning, with perfum'd wings and breathings light,
The sober footsteps of retiring night.

Sun-Rise.

FORTH from the gorgeous east, as from an urn,
Spring mighty floods of rich and glorious light;
The heavens are bath'd in sun-shine, and are bright,
As if with smiles, and then all blushing burn
Like a bride's cheek, who hails her lord's return
From his first absence—who can marvel now,
At that deep worship which the Ghebir paid
To his resplendent god,—from the hill-brow,
Which new-born sun-beams cloth'd, whilst yet the shade

Of night lay pillow'd on the mists below;
Or who could view you cloudy ocean, roll'd
In waves of ruby, amethyst, and gold;
Nor raise his heart to that First Cause, who bade
The fields of morning thus to be array'd.

Noon.

Down from his blazing car, the lord of day,
Hurls a fierce splendour through the sultry air,
Bright, fiery, piercing, as his arrows were,
When, writhing at his feet, the Python lay.
The shadowless scene gleams dim through the white
glare,
And the tam'd tiger gasps beneath the ray.
'Midst smoking marshes and hot reeds, the hoar
Hides from the scorching blast, while the worn snake
Lies lank and torpid in the deepest brake.
The spirits of the southern whirlwind soar
Upon its burning breath, and hurry by
Each shatter'd cloud, that o'er the dazzling sky
Casts a brief veil—so man, as frail, is driven,
By passion's withering blast, from peace and heaven.

Evening.

THRON'D amidst thunder-clouds, the dark toofaun
Frowns grimly down upon the sinking sun,
With all his banners purple, black, and dun,
Unfurld for war.—The tribes of air have gone
Wheeling and screaming—flying from the gale,
Like ocean-mists;—a solitary sail
Shines through the gloom, and o'er the murky river,
Like hope's last ray to hearts it leaves for ever.
Now bursts the storm in one terrific howl,
Wild as the din of hell. The lightnings pale
Glitter through rattling cataracts of hail.
The clouds rush down in floods, the heavens scowl,
Earth shakes, and all its groaning forests nod:
Kneel, man! and deprecate the wrath of God.

Night.

THE storm has past, and dewy silence rests
Upon the broad blue river, and the earth;
The perfum'd air is cool, as tho' its birth
Had been 'midst Himalayah's frozen crests.

How calm, how silent—save where the plashing oar
Dips faint and far, rippling the lamp's pale beam
That shoots from mosque or temple on the shore,
Athwart the eddying Gunga's holy stream.
And see! the rising moon:—around her gleam,
The stars, bright satraps of her silver throne,
Lighting the hour, when, sadly and alone,
The exile muses.—What to him are these,
The East's resplendent skies and fragrant trees,
This clime of flowers and stars?—Alas! 'tis not his

THE INDIAN LOVER'S SONG.

By the same.

HASTEN, love, the sun hath set?
And the moon, through twilight gleaming,
On the mosque's white minaret,
Now in silver light is streaming.

All is hush'd in deep repose;
Silence rests on field and dwelling,
Save where the bulbul to the rose
Is a love-tale sweetly telling.

Save the ripple, faint and far,
Of the river softly gliding;
Soft as thine own murmurs are,
When my kisses gently chiding.

Stars are sparkling in the sky,—
Blest abodes of light and gladness.
Oh, my life!—that thou and I
Might quit for them this world of sadness!

Yet, not within the mighty range
Of orbs, like very diamonds shewing,
Are any two for which I'd change
Thy two dear eyes, with fondness glowing.

See the fire-fly in the tope,
Cheerily midst darkness shining,
As the light which love and hope
Sends to calm my soul's repining.

Sweet the night-wind beareth by
Scents from flowers, of nature's wreathing,
Till I think my Lilliu nigh,
And the perfumed breeze her breathing.

The soft air stirs the lemon-grass;—
I think it is her step, that lightly
O'er the opening buds can pass,
Nor bend them more than dew drops nightly.

Then haste, blest treasure of my heart!
Flowers around, and stars above, thee,
Alone must view us meet and part;—
Alone must witness—how I love thee.

THE MUSSULMAN'S LAMENT OVER THE BODY OF TIPPOO SULTAN.

Written in 1823, on the spot where he fell.

LIGHT of my faith! thy flame is quench'd
In this deep night of blood;
The sceptre from thy race is wrenched;
And, of the brave who stood
Around thy Musnud, strong and true,
When this day's sun-rise on the brow
Of yonder mountains glanced, how few
Are left to weep thee now!—

* Chorus of Soldiers.

Allah! 'tis better thus to die,
With war-clouds hanging redly o'er us;
Than to live a life of infamy,
With years of grief and shame before us.

Star of the battle! thou art set;
But thou didst not sink down,
As those who could their fame forget,
Before the tempest's frown;
As those crown'd dastards, who could crave
The mercy of their haughty foes;—
Better to perish with the brave,
Than to live and reign like those.
Allah! 'tis better thus to die, &c.

No! thou hast to thy battle-bed
Rush'd like thy native sun,
Whose fiercest, brightest rays are shed
When his race is nearest done;
Where sabres flash'd, and volleys rung,
And quickest sped the parting breath,
Thou, from a life of empire, sprung
To meet a soldier's death.
Allah! 'tis better thus to die, &c.

Thy mighty father, joyfully
Look'd from his throne on high;—
He mark'd his spirit live in thee,
He smiled to see thee die;
To see thy sabre's last faint sweep*
Tinged with a foeman's gore;
To see thee sink to the hero's sleep,
With thy red wounds all before.
Allah! 'tis better thus to die, &c.

The faithful, in their emerald bowers
The toobah-tree beneath,
Have twined thee, of unfading flowers,
The martyr's glorious wreath;
And dark-eyed girls of paradise,
Their jewell'd kerchiefs wave,
To welcome to their crystal skies
The Sultan of the Brave.

Allah! 'tis sweeter thus to die
The martyr's death, with heaven before us,
Than to live an age—with infamy,
And foemen's fetters hanging o'er us.

* An historical fact.

THE NORTH-EAST TRADE.

MERRILY, merrily the good ship goes,
Like a sea-bird o'er the sea;
Swift as in spring the startled roes
Dash bounding o'er the lea;
As she stoops before the northern wind,
The curling waves are left behind;
But the gallant albacore,
With spring and bound,
Like a new-slipp'd hound,
Still swims abreast her prore.

Merrily, merrily, the good ship goes;
And the track she leaves astern
Is dazzling white, as mountain-snows,
When they cover mountain-fern.
Talk of the southern breeze, that breathes
Amongst the garden's flowery wreathes!
But give me the fresh north blast,—
The whistling gale
That fills the sail,
And bends the quivering mast.

Merrily, merrily, the good ship goes,
She feels the brave blast now;
Beneath her stern, the breakers close
That she dashes from her bow;
Through rattling block and creaking shroud
The cheery wind pipes clear and loud,
While the waves of the glorious sea
Around her pour,
As if they bore,
Some Ocean-Deity.

THE WIDOW OF THE MYSORE HILL.

A Fact.

THE way was rough, the night was chill,
Darkness was falling on the hill,
When I heard a woman making moan;
Bitterly bitterly, wept she,
Sitting upon a worn grey stone
By a blighted Banyan tree.

In the monsoon's drear cloudy sky
The lightning glimmer'd silently;
The hot breeze with the day had died,
The thunder slumber'd on its throne;
No sound was on the mountain's side,
Save that poor woman's moan.

"He is fallen! he is gone!
In the world I am left alone,
Ah!—would I were alone—for then!"
Darkly she glanced at the pool, which lay
Dim and deep in a rocky glen,
Then, shuddering, turn'd away.

"Alas! my helpless babes," said she,
And rose, still weeping bitterly;
I am selfish in my lonely grief,
But the bright Moslem host, from thrones
Beyond those clouds, will send relief
To my bereaved ones.

"E'en now their father greets the bold
Who battled by his side of old,
When o'er the land the burning star
Of Islam pour'd its dazzling light,
And conquering Hyder to the war
Rush'd, with a tempest's might.

"Poor children!—they will never more
At sunset, by our cottage-door,
In mimic combat learn to wield
Their father's glittering scimitar.
Ah! dim will be the bright black shield
Of my poor Sillahdar*.

"His lance hangs rusting on the wall,
His steed has broken from his stall,
And those brave boys, who were to rein
His gallant horse, and draw his bow,
Gaze on them sadly, and in vain;
They have no father now!

"Even now they weep, and wonder why
Out cot is dark, and I not nigh:
Oh, it is hard to bear!" she cried,
Then slowly, through the deepening gloom,
She glided down the mountain's side,
Like a spirit to its tomb.

STANZAS WRITTEN ON THE RIVER GANGES.

SOFTLY the purple veil of evening falls
Upon the far-off city—the young moon
Touches with silver, domes and snowy walls,
While a mild breeze, like that of England's June,
Ripples the tranquil river, spreading far
The tremulous light of each reflected star.

The boatmen's fires glance redly from the banks,
Softening the pallid lustre of the gleam
Which the now-setting moon casts through the rank
Of graceful palms athwart the broad blue stream;
Around me is a whispering solitude,
The murmuring waves, the gently-rustling wood.

The rustling wood within whose leafy brakes
The cheerful singer of the night-long song,
The cricket, his shrill carolling awakes,
While over him the fire-fly floats along
With dewy lustre, like a magic gem
In some invisible fairy's diadem.

Glad and bright creatures—each hath got a home
To which he wends, his wanderings being done,
And with him enters joy—no more he'll roam
Or light his little lamp 'till set of sun
Brings back the fragrant hours of dewy night
Through which he loves to wheel his gentle flight.

Cribb'd in a narrow shallop which the tide
Stirs with a sleepy motion to and fro,
Oh! how I long for wings with which to glide
Like you, bright insects, where the night flowers blow:
To swing on the light boughs of bamboo trees,
Or float with the sweet breath of this cool breeze.

* A Mysore horse-soldier.

I'd seek each opening floweret too, as dawn
Touch'd with her faintest silver the grey east,
And catch its fragrance, ere upon the lawn
The fiery light of the fierce sun increased.
Alas! how many a bud that loves the shade
Comes into glare and splendour but to fade.

But vain are wishes, or I should not pine
A solitary exile in a land
Where my heart is not—in the diamond mine;
What are the gems heap'd high on every hand
To the worn slave whose thoughts, whose longings
stray
To some rude hovel home far, far away.

So though around me golden fountains sprung
Of riches and of pleasure—if for me
Honour and power their proud trumpets rung,
And all life's splendours sparkled gorgeously,
What lustre in a foreign land can come
To dim the halo round our sacred HOME?

THE RETURN FROM INDIA.

I sit beside my lonely hearth,
Long years of toil and exile past,
My life is in its twilight path,
Still I have reached my home at last;
But other hands now cull its flowers,
But other footsteps tread its floor,
That clock still chimes the silver hours,
But those who heard it hear no more!

I am a stranger in my hall,
The hearts which made it glad are cold,
Young voices answer to my call
But not the tones I loved of old;—
With happy looks they bid me tell
Some story of the days gone by,
Or speak of those I loved so well,
I can but answer with a sigh.

With smiles they urge me to recall
The memory of their childhood's prime,
For they were happy children all
When last I left my native clime;
But as they speak some cherished trait
Arises with each look and tone,
Of those whose love has past away,
Of those who are for ever gone.

I wonder on the breezy hill,
By hazel copse, in dingle green,
I pause beside the gushing rill,
When summer twilight sinks serene;
Each well-remembered scene is there
Dear as when first it met my sight,
But where are all the feelings, where!
Which made it not more dear than bright?

The harvest moon is rising now
O'er golden fields of ripened grain,
And on the breeze that cools my brow
The bells of many a harvest wain

Come soft and sweet : but sweeter yet
Yon spire on which the moonshine glows,
That tells me where I shall forget
Life's withered hopes in death's repose.

OCEAN SKETCHES.

Written during a voyage to India.

[A Breeze—at Mid-day.]

THE distant haze, like clouds of silvery dust,
Now sparkles in the sun. The freshening breeze
Whitens the liquid plain ; and like a steed
With proud impatience fired, the glorious ship
Quick bounds exultant, and with rampant prow
Off flings the glittering foam. Around her wake,
A radiant milky way, the sea-birds weave
Their circling flight, or slowly sweeping wide
O'er boundless ocean, graze with drooping wing
The brightly-crested waves. Each sudden surge,
Up-dashed, appears a momentary tree
Fringed with the hoar-frost of a wintry morn ;
And then, like blossoms from a breeze-stirred bough,
The light spray strews the deep.

How fitfully the struggling day-beams pierce
The veil of heaven !—On yon far line of light,
That like a range of breakers streaks the main,
The ocean swan—the snow-white Albatross,
Gleams like a dazzling foam-flake in the sun !—
Gaze upward—and behold, where parted clouds
Disclose ethereal depths, its dark-hued mate
Hangs motionless on arch-resembling wings,
As though 'twere painted on the sky's blue vault.

Sprinkling the air, the speck-like petrels form
A living shower !—Awile their pinions gray
Mingle scarce-seen among the misty clouds,
Till suddenly their white breasts catch the light,
And flash like silver stars !

[A Storm—at Night.]

Yox cloud-arch spreads,—the black waves curl and foam

Beneath the coming tempest ;—Lo ! 'tis here !
The fierce insatiate winds, like demons, howl
Around the labouring bark. Her snow-white sails,
Out spread like wings of some gigantic bird
Struck with dismay, are fluttering in the gale,
And sound like far-off thunder. Now the heart
Of ocean quails to its profoundest depths ;—
The dark heavens groan,—the wildly scattered clouds
Like routed hosts, are thickly hurrying past
The dim-discovered stars. Up lofty hills,
Or down wide-yawning vales, the lone ship drives
As if to swift destruction. Still she braves,
Though rudely buffeted by tempest-fiends,
The elemental war. Ah ! that dread wave,
As though some huge sea-monster dealt the blow,
Hath made her start and tremble !—Yet again,
For one hushed moment, with recovered power,
She proudly glides in majesty serene,

* Author of "Literary Leaves; or Prose and Verse," &c.

Calm as a silver cloud on summer skies,
Or yon pale moon amid the strife of heaven !

How terrible, yet glorious is the scene !
How swells the gazer's heart !—The mighty main
Heaves its stupendous mountains to the sky,
Their sides unruffled by the fretful waves
Of less terrific seas. Each billow forms
One vast Atlantic Alp, whose peak alone
Is shattered by the wind that hurls the foam
Adown the dreary vales. In wintry realms
The viewless pinions of the northern breeze,
Thus shake the snow-wreaths from the hoary heads
Of everlasting hills !

An awful pause !—

Again the quick-reviving tempest roars
With fiercer rage !—These changes image well
The sullen calm of comfortless despair,
The restless tumult of the guilty heart !

[A Calm—at Mid-day.]

Now in the fervid noon the smooth bright sea
Heaves slowly, for the wandering winds are dead
That stirred it into foam. The lonely ship
Rolls wearily, and idly flap the sails
Against the creaking mast. The lightest sound
Is lost not on the ear, and things minute
Attract the observant eye.

The scaly tribe,
Bright-winged, that upward flash from torrid seas,
Like startled birds, now burst their glassy caves,
And glitter in the sun ; while diamond drops
From off their briny pinions fall like rain,
And leave a dampled track.

The horizon clouds
Are motionless, and yield fantastic forms
Of antique towers, vast woods and frozen lakes,
Huge rampant beasts, and giant phantoms seen
In wildering visions only.

High o'er head,
Dazzling the sight, hangs, quivering like a lark,
The silver Tropic-bird ;—at length it flits
Far in cerulean depths and disappears,
Save for a moment, when with fitful gleam
It waves its wings in light. The pale thin moon,
Her crescent floating on the azure air,
Shows like a white bark sleeping on the main
When not a ripple stirs. Yon bright clouds form, (Bridged as the ocean sands, with spots of blue,
Like water left by the receding tide,)
A fair celestial shore !—How beautiful !
The spirit of eternal peace hath thrown
A spell upon the scene ! The wide blue floor
Of the Atlantic world—a sky-girt plain—
Now looks as never more the Tempest's tread
Would break its shining surface ; and the ship
Seems destined ne'er again to brave the gale,
Anchored for ever on the silent deep !

[Sun-Rise.]

THE stars have melted in the morning air,—
The white moon waneth dim.—The glorious sun,
Slow-rising from the cold cerulean main,
Now shoots through broken clouds his upward
beams,

That kindle into day. At length his orb,
 Reddening the ocean verge, with sudden blaze
 Awakes a smiling world :—the dull gray mist
 Is scattered, and the sea-view opens wide !

—The glassy waves
 Are touched with joy, and dance in sparkling throngs
 Around the gallant bark. The roseate clouds
 Rest on the warm horizon,—like far hills
 Their radiant outlines gleam in yellow light,
 And o'er their shadowy range a thin scud floats,
 Like wreaths of smoke from far-off beacon-fires.

The deep blue vault is streaked with golden bars,
 Like veins in wealthy mines ; and where the rays
 Of Day's refulgent orb are lost in air,
 In small round masses shine the fleecy clouds,
 As bright as snow-clad bowers when sudden gleams
 Flash on the frozen earth.

Ascending high
 The gorgeous steps of heaven, the dazzling sun
 Contracts his disk, and rapidly assumes
 A silver radiance—glittering like a globe
 Of diamond spars !

[Sun-set.]

Now near the flushed horizon brightly glows
 The red dilated sun. Around his path
 Aerial phantoms float in liquid light,
 And steeped in beauty, momentarily present
 Fresh forms, and strange varieties of hue,
 As fair and fleeting as our early dreams !—
 Behold him rest on yon cloud-mountain's peak,—
 Touched with celestial fire, volcano-like,
 The dazzling summit burns ;—eruptive flames
 Of molten gold with ruddy lustre tinge
 The western heavens, and shine with mellowed light
 Through crests transparent of the countless waves !

The scene is changed—behind the ethereal mount
 Now fringed with light—the day-god downward speeds

His unseen way ;—yet where his kindling steps
 Lit the blue vault, the radiant trace remains,
 E'en as the sacred memory of the past
 Illumes life's evening hour !—Again ! Again !
 He proudly comes ! and lo ! resplendent sight !
 Bursts through the cloud-formed hill, whose shattered sides

Are edged with mimic lightning !—His red beams
 Concentrating at last in one full blaze,
 Bright as a flaming bark his fiery form
 Sinks in the cold blue main !

The golden clouds
 Fade into gray—the broad cerulean tide
 A darker tint assumes. In restless throngs
 Phosphoric glow-worms deck with living gems
 The twilight wave, as Orient fire-flies gleam
 In dusky groves,—or like reflected stars,
 When evening zephyrs kiss the dimpled face
 Of that far lake whose crystal mirror bears
 An image of my home ! Ah, those white walls,
 Now flash their silent beauty on my soul,
 And, like a cheerful sun-burst on my way,
 Revive a transient joy !

[Night.]

THE day beams slowly fade, and shadowy night,
 Soft as a gradual dream, serenely steals
 Over the watery waste. Like low-breathed strains
 Of distant music on the doubtful ear,
 When solitude and silence reign around,
 The small waves gently murmur.

Calm and pale—
 A phantom of the sky—the full-orbed moon
 Hath glided into sight. The glimmering stars
 Now pierce the soft obscurity of heaven
 In golden swarms, innumerable and bright
 As insect-myrriads in the sunset air.
 The breeze is hushed, and yet the tremulous sea,
 As if by host of unseen spirits trod,
 Is broken into ripples, crisp and clear
 As shining fragments of a frozen stream
 Beneath the winter sun. The lunar wake
 Presents to rapt imagination's view
 A pathway to the skies !

In such a scene
 Of glory and repose, the rudest breast
 Is pure and passionless,—the holy calm
 Is breathed at once from heaven, and sounds and thoughts

Of human strife a mockery would seem
 Of Nature's mystic silence. Sacred dreams
 Unutterable, deep, and undefined,
 Now crowd upon the soul, and make us feel
 An intellectual contact with the world
 Beyond our mortal vision.

WRITTEN ON THE RUINS OF RAJMAHAL.

HAIL, stranger, hail ! whose eye shall here survey
 The path of Time, where ruin marks his way,
 When wildly moans the solemn midnight bird,
 And the gaunt jackal's piercing cry is heard :
 If thine the soul with sacred ardour fraught,
 Rapt in the poet's dream, or sage's thought,
 To thee, these mouldering walls a voice shall raise,
 And sadly tell how earthly pride decays ;
 How human hopes, like human works, depart,
 And leave behind—the ruins of the heart !

EVENING, ON THE BANKS OF THE GANGES.

I WANDERED thoughtfully by Gunga's shore,
 While the broad sun upon the slumbering wave
 Its last faint flush of golden radiance gave,
 And tinged with tenderest hues some ruins hoar.
 Methinks this earth had never known before
 A calm so deep—'twas silent as the grave.
 The smallest bird its light wing could not lave
 In the smooth flood, nor from the green-wood soar
 (If but the tiniest branch its pinions stirred,
 Or shook the dew-drops from the leaves,) unheard.
 Like pictured shadows 'gainst the western beam
 The dark boats slept, while each lone helmsman stood
 Still as a statue !—the strange quietude
 Enthralled my soul like some mysterious dream !

THE RETURN FROM EXILE.

I.

As memory pictured happier hours, home-sickness
 seized my heart,
 I never thought of English land but burning tears
 would start ;
 The faces of familiar friends would haunt me in my sleep,
 I clasped their thrilling hands in mine—then woke again to weep !

II.

At last my spirit's fevered dreams so wrought upon my frame,
 That life itself uncertain seemed as some worn taper's
 flame,
 'Till o'er the wide blue waters borne, from regions
 strange and far,
 I saw dear Albion's bright cliffs gleam beneath the morning star !

III.

That radiant sight redeemed the past, and stirred with transport wild,
 I paced the swift bark's bounding deck, light-hearted
 as a child ;
 And when among my native fields I wandered in the sun,
 I felt as if my morn of life had only just begun.

IV.

The shining golden butter-cup—the daisy's silver crest—
 The living gems of every hue on Nature's verdant
 breast—
 The cheerful songs of British birds, that rose from British trees—
 The fragrance from the blossomed hedge, that came on every breeze—

V.

The white cot peeping from the grove, its blue smoke in the sky—
 The rural group of ruddy boys, that gaily loitered
 nigh—
 The silent sheep-besprinkled hill—the rivulet-watered vale—
 The lonely lake, where brightly shone, the fisher's
 sun-lit sail ;—

VI.

Awhile these seemed illusions brief of beauty and
 delight,
 A dear but transitory dream—a mockery of the
 night !
 For often in my slumbering hours on India's sultry
 strand,
 In visions, scarce less palpable, I hailed my native
 land.

VII.

But when upon my wildering doubts reflection
 flashed the truth,
 Oh ! never in my childhood years, nor in my fervid
 youth,
 So deep a rapture thrill'd my breast as while I gazed around,
 And recognized the thousand charms that hallow
 English ground !
 1824.

AN INDIAN DAY.

Morn.

Lo ! Morning wakes upon the grey hill's brow,
 Raising the veil of mist meek Twilight wore ;—
 And hark ! from mango tope and tamarind bough
 The glad birds' matins ring ! On Gunga's shore
 Yon sable groups with ritual signs adore
 The rising Lord of Day. Above the vale
 Behold the tall palmyrah proudly soar,
 And wave his verdant wreath,—a lustre pale
 Gleams on the broad fringed leaves that rustle in the gale.

Noon.

'Tis now the noon-tide hour ! No sounds arise
 To cheer the sultry calm,—deep silence reigns
 Among the drooping groves ; the fervid skies
 Glare on the slumbering wave ; on yon wide plains
 The zephyr dies,—no hope of rest detains
 The wanderer there ; the sun's meridian might
 No fragrant bower, no humid cloud restrains,—
 The burning rays, insufferably bright,
 Play on the fevered brow, and mock the dazzled sight !

Night.

THE gentle Evening comes ! The gradual breeze,
 The milder radiance and the longer shade,
 Steal o'er the scene !—Through slowly waving trees
 The pale moon smiles,—the minstrels of the glade
 Hail night's fair queen ; and, as the day-beams fade
 Along the crimson west through twilight gloom
 The fire-fly darts ; and where, all lowly laid,
 The dead repose, the Moslem's hands illume
 The consecrated lamp o'er Beauty's hallowed tomb !

SONNET,

On hearing Captain James Glencairn Burns sing (in India) his father's songs.

How dream-like is the sound of native song
 Heard on a foreign shore ! The wanderer's ear
 Drinks wild enchantment,—swiftly fade the drear
 And cold realities that round him throng,
 While in the soul's delirium, sweet and strong,
 The past is present and the distant near !
 Such sound is sacred ever,—doubly dear
 When heard by patriot exiles parted long
 From all that love hath hallowed. But a spell
 Ev'n yet more holy breathes in every note
 Now trembling on my heart. A proud Son sings
 The lay of Burns ! Oh ! what imaginings
 Awake, as o'er a foreign region float
 These filial echoes of the father's shell !

Calcutta, August 7, 1833.

SONNET—THE SUTTEE.

HER last fond wishes breathed, a farewell smile
 Is lingering on the calm unclouded brow
 Of yon deluded victim. Firmly now
 She mounts, with dauntless mien, the funeral pile
 Where lies her earthly lord. The Brahmin's guise
 Hath wrought its will—fraternal hands bestow
 The quick death-flame—the crackling embers glow—
 And flakes of hideous smoke the skies defile !
 The ruthless throng their ready aid supply,
 And pour the kindling oil. The stunning sound
 Of dissonant drums—the priest's exulting cry—
 The failing martyr's pleading voice have drowned ;
 While fiercely-burning rafters fall around,
 And shroud her frame from horror's straining eye !

CONSOLATIONS OF EXILE.

[Or an Exile's Address to his Distant Children.]

O'ER the vast realm of tempest-troubled Ocean—
 O'er the parched lands that vainly thirst for showers— [motion
 Through the long night—or when nor sound nor Stirs in the noon of day the sultry bowers—
 Not all un'accompanied by pleasant dreams
 My weary spirit panteth on the way ;
 Still on mine inward sight the subtle gleams
 That mock the fleshly vision brightly play.
 Oh ! the heart's links nor time nor change may sever,
 Nor fate's destructive hand, while life remain ;
 O'er hill, and vale, and plain, and sea, and river,
 The wanderer draws the inseparable chain !

Fair children ! still, like phantoms of delight,
 Ye haunt my soul on this strange distant shore,
 As the same stars shine through the tropic night
 That charmed me at my own sweet cottage door.
 Though I have left ye long, I love not less ;
 Though ye are far away, I watch ye still ;
 Though I can ne'er embrace ye, I may bless,
 And e'en though absent, guard ye from each ill !
 Still the full interchange of soul is ours,
 A silent converse o'er the waters wide,
 And fancy's spell can speed the lingering hours
 And fill the space that yearning hearts divide.

And not alone the written symbols show
 Your spirits' sacred stores of love and truth,
 Art's glorious magic bids the canvas glow
 With all your grace and loveliness and youth ;
 The fairy forms that in my native land
 Oft filled my fond heart with a parent's pride,
 Are gathered near me on this foreign strand,
 And smilingly, in these strange halls, reside ;
 And almost I forget an exile's doom,
 For while your filial eyes around me gleam,
 Each scene and object breathes an air of home,
 And time and distance vanish like a dream !

Oh ! when sweet Memory's radiant calm comes o'er
 The weary soul, as moonlight glimmerings fall
 O'er the hushed ocean, forms beloved of yore
 And joys long fled, her whispers soft recall ;
 At such an hour I live and smile again,
 As light of heart as in that golden time
 When, as a child, I trod the vernal plain,
 Nor knew the shadow of a care or crime.
 Nor dream of death, nor weariness of life,
 Nor freezing apathy, nor fierce desire,
 Then chilled a thought with unborn rapture rife,
 Or seared my breast with wild ambition's fire.

From many a fruit and flower the hand of Time
 Hath brushed the bloom and beauty ; yet mine eye,
 Though Life's sweet summer waneth, and my prime
 Of health and hope is past, can oft espy
 Amid the fading wilderness around
 Such lingering hues as Eden's holy bowers
 In earth's first radiance wore, and only found
 Where not a cloud of sullen sadness lours.
 Oh ! how the pride and glory of this world
 May pass unmirrored, o'er the darkened mind,
 Like gilded banners o'er the grave unfurled,
 Or Beauty's witcheries flashed upon the blind.

Though this frail form hath felt the shafts of pain,
 Though my soul sickens for her native sky,
 In visionary hours my thoughts regain
 Their early freshness, and soon check the sigh
 That sometimes from mine inmost heart would swell
 And mar a happier mood. Oh ! then how sweet,
 Dear Boys ! upon remembered bliss to dwell,
 And here your pictured lineaments to greet !
 Till Fancy, bright enchantress, shifts the scene
 To British ground, and musical as rills,
 Ye laugh and loiter in the meadows green,
 Or climb with joyous shouts the sunny hills !
Calcutta, Sept. 4, 1834.

SONNETS,

Written in Exile.

I.

MAN's heart may change, but Nature's glory never ;—
 And while the soul's internal cell is bright
 The unclouded eye lets in the ceaseless light
 Of outer loveliness to charm us ever.
 Though youth hath vanished, like a winding river
 Lost in the shadowy woods ; and the dear sight
 Of native hill, and nest-like cottage white
 'Mid breeze-stirred boughs whose green leaves gleam
 and quiver,

And murmur sea-like sounds, perchance no more
 My homeward step shall hasten cheerily ;
 Yet still I feel as I have felt of yore,
 And love this radiant world. Yon clear blue sky—
 These gorgeous groves—this flower-enamelled floor—
 Have deep enchantments for my heart and eye.

II.

Man's heart may change, but Nature's glory never ;—
 Though to the sullen gaze of grief the sight
 Of sun-illumined skies may seem less bright,
 Or gathering clouds less grand, yet she, as ever
 Is lovely or majestic. Though fate sever
 The long-linked bands of love, and all delight
 Be lost as in a sudden starless night,
 The radiance may return, if He, the giver
 Of peace on earth vouchsafe the storm to still.
 This breast once shaken with the strife of care
 Is touched with silent joy. The cot—the hill
 Beyond the broad blue wave, and faces fair,
 Are pictured in my dreams ; yet scenes that fill
 My waking eye can save me from despair.

III.

Man's heart may change but Nature's glory never ;—
 Strange features throng around me, and the shore
 Is not my father-land. Yet why deplore
 This varied doom ? All mortal ties must sever.—
 The pang is past ;—and now with blest endeavour
 I check the rising sigh, and weep no more.
 The common earth is here—these crouds adore
 That earth's Creator ; and how high soever
 O'er other tribes proud England's hosts may seem,
 God's children, fair or sable, equal find
 A father's love. Then learn, O man, to deem
 All difference idle save of heart or mind,
 Thy duty, love—each cause of strife, a dream—
 Thy home, the world—thy family, mankind.
Calcutta, July, 1839.

SONNETS WRITTEN ON THE VOYAGE TO INDIA.

[Fine Weather.]

THE plain of ocean 'neath the crystal air
 Its azure bound extends—the circle wide
 Is sharply clear,—contrasted hues divide
 The sky and water. Clouds, like hills that wear
 The winter's snow-wrought mantle, brightly fair,
 Rest on the main's blue marge.—As shadows glide
 O'er dew-decked fields, the calm ship seems to slide
 O'er glassy paths that catch the noon-tide glare
 As if bestrown with diamonds. Quickly play
 The small crisp waves that musically break
 Their shining peaks.—And now, if aught can make Celestial spirits wing their downward way,
 Methinks they glitter in the proud sun's wake,
 And breathe a glorious beauty on the day !

[A Calm, after a gale.]

LIKE mountain-mists that roll on sultry airs,
 Unheard and slow the huge waves heave around
 That lately roared in wrath. The storm-fiend, bound
 Within his unseen cave no longer tears
 The vexed and wearied main. The moon appears,
 Uncurtaining wide her azure realms profound
 To cheer the sullen night. Though not a sound
 Reposing Nature breathes, my rapt soul hears
 The far-off murmur of my native streams
 Like music from the stars—the silver tone
 Is memory's lingering echo ;—Ocean's zone
 Infolds me from the past ;—this small bark seems
 The centre of a world—an island lone ;
 And home's dear forms are like departed dreams !

LINES TO A LADY WHO PRESENTED THE AUTHOR WITH SOME ENGLISH FRUITS AND FLOWERS.

GREEN herbs and gushing springs in some hot waste,
 Though grateful to the traveller's sight and taste,
 Seem far less fair and fresh than fruits and flowers
 That breathe, in foreign lands, of English bowers.
 Thy gracious gift, dear lady, well recalls
 Sweet scenes of home,—the white cot's trellised walls—
 The clean red garden path—the rustic seat—
 The jasmine-covered arbour, fit retreat
 For hearts that love repose. Each spot displays
 Some long-remembered charm. In sweet amaze
 I feel as one, who, from a weary dream
 Of exile wakes, and sees the morning beam
 Illume the glorious clouds, of every hue,
 That float o'er fields his happy childhood knew.
 How small a spark may kindle fancy's flame,
 And light up all the past ! The very same
 Glad sounds and sights that charmed my heart of old,
 Arrest me now—I hear them and behold.
 Ah ! yonder is the happy circle seated
 Within the favourite bower ! I am greeted
 With joyous shouts ; my rosy boys have heard
 A father's voice—their little hearts are stirred
 With eager hope of some new toy or treat,
 And on they rush with never-resting feet !

Gone is the sweet illusion—like a scene
 Formed by the western vapours, when between
 The dusky earth and day's departing light,
 The curtain falls of India's sudden night..

CAPT. MACNAGHTEN*.

THE DAISY.

Written in India.

THE daisy ! the daisy ! I long to see again,
 That sweet and unobtrusive flower, upon my native
 plain.

With it how often have I wreath'd a coronal, to deck
 The brow of some young maiden, or a garland for her neck !—

A boyish and a girlish love, but not without its feud,
 If a rival braid was chosen, or if I another woo'd !—
 Yet fond and light of heart would we to some wild
 boweret steal,

Unscath'd by all the bitterer grief maturer love must feel.

The daisy ! the daisy ! an exile's flower of home,
 Which most of all recalls our hearts, though far our footsteps roam :

We see the rose and violet beneath an eastern sky,
 And the briar and the wall-flow'r sweet, will sometimes glad the eye ;

And blossoms like the harebell blue, and primrose
 pale, there be,

And the perfume of the hawthorn sheds the scented
 baubool tree ;

But the banish'd man would liefer view the daisy white and small, •

The time-mark of his boyish life of pureness, than them all.

The daisy ! the daisy ! enameller of the green !

The sward hath nought of magic power where thou art not its Queen.

A brighter bud, and fragranter, may decorate the
 ground,

But the heart—the heart—no home can own, where thou art never found.

We've here no meadow's silken grass, where we might love to lie, [by :

And listen to the cuckoo's note, or streamlet purling
 Oh ! cheerless is the wanderer's lot, in alien lands to dwell ;

He comes, and hears no welcome said—he goes, and no farewell†.

The daisy ! the daisy ! 'when I was but a boy,
 And ere I knew enough of grief my gladness to ally ;

I little deem'd the hour would come, when I could blithely yield [field.

The hopes of worldly fortune for one daisy-dotted
 But bright was life's horizon then, and how my spirit
 long'd,

To snap the rein that check'd me yet, and throng
 where others throng'd !

To run the race which manhood runs, o'er ocean,
 mount, and plain—

Oh ! would I had the daisied knoll, and thoughtless life again !

* Author of "Miscellaneous Verses."

† This is too beautiful a thought for me to appropriate it, farther than I have done by rendering it into poetic metre, without an acknowledgment that I owe it to a mournful observation contained in that most agreeable of all journalised tours—The Diary of an Invalid.

The daisy ! the daisy ! Spring's longest living child !
 Thou call'st to mind the hours when yet the heart
 was undefil'd ;
 When bounding o'er the fragrant fields, with feet that lightly sped,
 Thy small, elastic stem would rise uninjur'd from our tread :
 When flying on the spirit's wings, we knew nor grief
 nor care,
 But deem'd the world a paradise, and all within it
 fair :
 How many a sear'd and weary man, in crime or sadness steep'd,
 A harvest little thought of in that daisy time, hath reap'd !

The daisy ! the daisy ! oh, may my lot be yet,
 To see it grace the happy plains, my heart doth not forget !
 To see it wreath'd by other hands, as sinless and as young,
 As mine were when its buds, to deck some peri form,
 I strung !
 To hear their burst of ringing glee, as o'er the meads
 they stray,
 And think my own was loud as their's, my spring-
 time mood as gay ;
 When with the merry lark I rose, the linnet's nest to seek,
 And the carmine-tinting kiss of morn was lavish'd on my cheek !

VOYAGE INVOCATION .

Written in India.

UNCHANGING blow, thou favoring gale !
 And softly roll, thou sea !
 And swift thou gallant vessel sail,
 That bear'st my love to me !

May beauteous Zephyr's pinion light
 Impel thy eastward prow ;
 And sweetly fan those ringlets bright,
 Which cluster round her brow !

Oh ! may'st thou track the plumbless seas,
 In Neptune's blandest mood ;
 When Nereids' sighs augment the breeze,
 But ne'er a breath more rude !

Far be the Tempest-Spirit's path,
 Thou good bark, from thy way !
 And, for his fearful voice of wrath,
 Be thine the mermaid's lay !

Above, may all unclouded skies !
 Their glories shed the while :
 Blue as her own enchanting eyes,
 And gentle as her smile !

And gaily sail, thou rich-stor'd ship,
 And waft across the sea,
 My Clara's heart, my Clara's lip,
 In all their love to me !

RETURN SONG OF THE EXILE.

HOME ! home ! home !—there is England's shining cliff,
 In the sun-gilt horizon afar !
 Bring the glass, boy, the glass !—there goes many a bird-like skiff,
 And there lie our proud men of war !
 Oh ! my heart, at the view, bounds as lightly as if
 'T was unscath'd as thy happiest are,
 Home ! Home !
 'T was unscathed as thy happiest are !

Home ! home ! home !—now I leap on the shore,
 Which has been, for some long years, to me,
 As a form we have once seen but never hope more,
 Though we pine ever after, to see ;
 And there be thy fields and their flowers, as before,
 Thou shrine of the lovely and free,
 Home ! Home !
 Thou shrine of the lovely and free !

Home ! home ! home !—there's the old village spire !
 There's the old village hostel, the " Plough !"
 And the old village school !—how much larger and higher,
 They appear'd in my young days, than now !
 There stands, too, the Hall of the old village Squire,
 And the mount, with thy oaks on its brow,
 Home ! Home !
 And the mount, with thy oaks on its brow !

Home ! home ! home !—there's the green and merry
 grove,
 Where we plunder'd the nut tree and nest !
 But where are they all, who, like me, us'd to rove,
 With a heart blithe as mine in each breast ?
 And she !—where is she ?—in whose fond, girlish
 love,
 E'er I left her and thee, I was blest,
 Home ! Home !
 E'er I left her and thee, I was blest !

Home ! home ! home !—I am rambling again,
 Mid the scenes where my boyhood was pass'd ;
 They're unchang'd, but, alas ! I am alter'd since
 then,
 And the brightness of youth's overcast :
 Yet they've balm for the soul of the wayfarer, when
 He takes shelter among them at last,
 Home ! Home !
 He takes shelter among them at last !

Home ! home ! home !—be thy heavens blue and clear,
 And thy plains in their gold dress, or green ;
 Or thy skies cloud-eclips'd, in the wane of the year,
 When thy waters and woods lose their sheen ;
 Thou art still, to the Exile return'd, far more dear,
 Than the fairest of climes he hath seen,
 Home ! Home !
 Than the fairest of climes he hath seen !

BANKS OF THE GANGES.

THE skies are fair in southern France,
 And brightly glows an English June ;
 And o'er the ocean's wide expanse,
 How gently smiles the cloudless moon,
 In the mild tropic !—but there's not,
 Beneath th' eternal heaven, a spot,
 O'er which the sun, the moon, and sky,
 Display a lovelier radiancy,
 Than where the sacred Ganges flows—
 Land of the bulbul and the rose !
 If its green banks have e'er been red,
 Those times of havoc long have fled ;
 And peace, conjoin'd with plenty, reigns
 Perennial 'mid those favour'd plains.
 With the once-conquering Moslem, here
 The Hindoo sits, untouch'd by fear ;
 And each sends up the pray'r to Heaven,
 By Shaster or by Koran given :
 Nor dares his neighbour's rites impede,
 Nor question his dissenting creed.
 Around, how tranquil is the scene,
 The air how clear—the sward how green !
 O'er all a luscious languor thrown,
 In the bright noon of that warm zone,
 Impels each youth and gentle maid
 To seek the near and various shade.
 Here towers the straight, umbrella'd palm,
 Moveless, though high,—the air's so calm !
 And, more removed, yet near the stream,
 Stand the thick mangoe groves, which seem
 Like those all-hallow'd bowers, where gods,
 In Rome's young days, had their abodes.
 There, the Briarean banyan spreads
 His hundred arms, and round him sheds,
 O'er roods of ground, his sheltering boughs—
 Fit place for young Love's timid vows.
 The light-leaf'd tamarind, more aloof,
 O'ershades the white pagoda's roof,
 'Neath which the tinkling, silvery bells,
 Denote that there the Brahmin dwells,
 In vain belief his God can hear
 Prayers which, though erring, are sincere.
 And you may see some Moslem tomb,
 Which pious cares each night illumine
 With one small light, that gleams afar,
 In twinkling beauty, like a star :
 And every hedge and copse are bright
 With the quick fire-fly's playful light,
 Like thousands of the sparkling gems,
 Which blaze in eastern diadems.
 There is no twilight there, but day
 So brightly vanishes away,
 That its reflection serves to light,
 For some brief time, the shades of night ;
 And mellows down what else were gloom
 To a sweet clear-obscure.—The doom
 Of many an anxious girl is seal'd
 At that lone hour, as (all reveal'd
 Her lover's fate) the little boat,
 With its pale light, may sink or float !
 Along the river's dazzling track,
 The boatman guides his dark oolak ;

Or urges on, with speedier oar,
 The light canoe along the shore ;
 While heavily upon its breast,
 The lazy budgerows nightly rest.

There's not a land on earth more fair,
 Than that whose soil the Ganges laves ;
 There's not a land more bless'd, than where,
 Through countless leagues it rolls its waves.
 Land of the wise !—though here unknown—
 Of men romantically bold,
 Whose fame had not, like meteors, flown,
 Had bards in song their deeds enroll'd.
 Land of the beauteous and the brave !
 Land of the Ganges' holy wave !

TWILIGHT WOOING.

Written in India.

COME, dearest, let us ramble forth to yon delicious spot,
 Where first we, chance-directed, strayed ; where pry-
 ing eyes are not.
 I want no human form but thine to lean with fondness o'er,
 I want no ear but thine, in which my murmur'd joy to pour. [vow,—
 Let three be there to witness, one to hearken to my
 The star of love, the dewy rose, the bulbul sweet,— and thou !

Around, how calm and beauteous all !—above, how soft and clear !
 And not a voice, save that dear bird's, to break the quiet here.
 The scarce felt breath of heaven comes faintly o'er thy timid cheek,
 But to waft the béla's perfume there that breath is all too weak.
 It vainly linger'd near the shrub, before it pass'd it by,
 To win an offering meet for thee—a flower's aroma'd
 sigh.

The stars have never seemed so bright and pure to me as now ; [brow ;
 I scarce would have a moonbeam on thy softly shaded
 I would not have it flutter'd on by even so rude an air
 As would move the lightest floweret, or disturb thy curling hair. [thus,
 Let others shine in taper'd halls—I love thee better
 And the gems of such a heaven as that give light enough for us.

Before thee flows in quietness, harmonious with the scene, [green,
 The broad and holy Jumna, by its banks of modest Upon it see the lotus bud some Hindoo girl hath flung,
 In whose breast lie love and hope entwin'd—for both as yet are young.
 And that white tomb thou viewest, with its lamp so small and pale,
 Is the dwelling of a Moslem maid,—I've heard them
 sing her tale.

'Twas young Zilara's fate to love—ah, what can love confine!—
A warrior chief, but one whose knee own'd not her
Prophet's shrine;
And shame, which could not shield her, caus'd that heart-pang to be kept
From all save one soft girl, and one to whom she pray'd and wept;
Her deep love was unheeded, but her faith was not betray'd,
And of that wild, hopeless passion died the tender
Moslem maid.

Thou sighest, love!—in sooth it is a tale to draw a sigh—
Or think'st thou that where lovers meet, a tomb should not be nigh?
It is no evil omen, Sweet!—that trembling heart restrain—
It cannot be thy lot to love, and not be lov'd
again.
Nay look not with that doubtful eye, as there mistrust might be,
The star, the bulbul, and the rose, are witnesses for
me.

Come, let me lead thy small, light feet, to where yon
Peepul's shade
Will hide from thee the lamp-lit house, where rests
the Moslem maid;
And there my ear shall drink thy tones, and into thine I'll pour
Such vows as thou shalt love to hear, but never heard before;
And vows my heart hath never made to any one but
thee,—
Come, dearest! let me guide thy steps beneath the Peepul tree.

What whisperest thou?—' If all my vows should frail and transient prove,
Like the flower and bird (their witnesses) and yon
bright star of love?
Remember, darling, that red rose will only cease to
bloom,
When the changeful season's cold neglect consigns it to the tomb;
And like that rose, the vows I breathe shall still un-
alter'd be,
Unless a change that blights the heart may yet be wrought in thee.

Remember, darling, though the bird we both delight
to hear,
Will leave the bower he sings in now, as wanes the various year;
'Twill be because a fairer spot, a yet more summery
grove,
Shall woo him hence, by offering him a sweeter flower
to love;
But earth has not, to tempt me forth, one being fair
as thou,
And therefore for the bulbul's cause, I cannot break
my vow.

Remember, darling, though yon Queen of Stars inconstant prove,
(The star that plighted hearts adore—the beauteous star of love!)
And soon from night's embrace may steal to the bright arms of morn, [born:
The change is from a Spirit dark to one of radiance
But where could I a lovelier find than she I thus entwine?—
So like the star I will not change, while thou wilt have me thine.

Now know I thou believ'st me :—by that soft and peaceful sigh,
By the muteness of thy lip, and by the speaking of thine eye, [form,
By the calmness of thy bosom, by thy gently leaning
By the delicate pressure of thy hand, so pure and yet
so warm, [brow,
By the tranquil color of thy cheek, the glory of thy
I feel within my raptur'd heart that thou believest now!

And oft, in this still, twilight time, I'll seek our lonely
bower, [hour;
And to others leave the revel, and the brilliant midnight
With all their hollow gaiety, and all their blissless
smiles,
And the speech that still deceives us, and the look that still beguiles.
Enough of earthly happiness this spot contains for
me,—
The Star, the Bulbul, and the Rose,—and thee, dear love, and THEE!

JOHN WM. KAYE*.

WRITTEN AT SEA ON THE 1ST OF MAY, 1833.

During a voyage to India.

THEY tell me this is May-day morn, but what is that to me
An alien from my father's home upon a foreign sea?
It makes the tear-drop glisten and it makes my bosom swell, [well,
To think how far away I am from all who love me
And can it be that this is May, the latest born of spring? [thing,
When beauty in my native land shines bright on every
And nature, in her best array, all garlanded with flowers,
Looks smiling up towards the sun and laughs between the showers.

I fancy that so sunny-bright I see my village-green,
And a joyous band of dancers round their beautiful
May-Queen;
I'm almost sure that I could guess the chosen one
this year,
But when I think on her I smile and swallow down
the tear.

* Author of "Poems and Fragments," "Jerningham,"
"Doveton," &c.

Oh ! how unlike the pleasant time I revelled in last
 May
 Is the dreariness that now attends each hour of every
 day :
 I cannot even spend my time as often I have done,
 For the huge giant-looking sails shut out the blessed
 sun.

Oh ! how unlike the lovely sights in nature I had
 then,
 The trees upon the mountain-tops, the streamlet in the glen,
 Is the never-changing wilderness of waters that I see
 Still rolling on, on every side, in rude immensity.

But more than all the wretchedness, to feel I am
 alone,
 To think that no heart near me beats in echo to my
 own ;
 I know that there are some whose thoughts may often turn to me—
 But they are many thousand miles across the yawning sea—

But these are thoughts most maiden-like and ill becoming me ;
 I must not think on what has been, but upon what shall be.
 The future is before me and whate'er may be my lot,
 I'll meet it as I ought to do, and I will murmur not.

'Tis good for all to suffer and for none to scape the rod,
 Which comes not to chastise us, but to turn our thoughts to God ;
 Affliction is a blessed thing and sweet the cup of
 woe ;
 "There's nothing either good or bad but thinking makes it so*."—

COMPOSED AT SEA, BY MOONLIGHT ; SEPT. 1833.

Written during a voyage to India.

THE moon hath clomb the top-most Heaven,
 And looks down on the wave,
 Like the eye of hope, which gleams upon
 The darkness of the grave.

I am sitting now beside the helm,
 Watching the waters black
 Close with a low and sullen roar
 Behind our vessel's track.

On, on, she goes, like a pawing steed,
 As though she felt delight
 In the freshness of the evening breeze,
 And the beauty of the night.

* Hamlet—There is a similar idea in the Encheiridion of Epictetus.

She almost seems like us to know
 That her course is well nigh run,
 And is giving a bounding spring at the last
 That the goal may be bravely won.

How beautifully white she gleams
 In all her proud array,
 You can see the shadow of each rope
 As clearly as by day ;

And as you look on her many sails
 From the helm unto the prow,
 It were not difficult to think,
 As I am thinking now,

That the spreading canvas over-head,
 The mariners asleep,
 And the huge pointed guns were like
 A camp upon the deep ;

Whilst the helms-man's eye on the compass-light
 Is fixed as on a spell ;
 And he stands scarce moving by the wheel—
 Mute as a sentinel.

I fain would have no thoughts of home,
 But that they will intrude,
 And rise in sunny visions up,
 To mock my solitude.

I would not think of that which is
 To me a thing denied ;
 It is enough that I am here
 What boots then aught beside ?

The future is before me now,
 Why think I of the past,
 I have been happy, may be still ;
 My sun is not o'er-cast.

But there is one to whom my thoughts
 In spite of all will stray,
 And why should they be checked for none
 More hallowed are than they.

My mother—my dear mother—why
 Should I check one thought of thee ?
 For if it makes me sad at times,
 I love not gaiety.

And more than all, on such a night,
 So calm—so pure above ;
 For what can be more calm and pure
 Than is a mother's love ?—

'Tis said that unto sever'd hearts
 Some solace it doth lend ;
 To think the orb, that smiles on you,
 Is smiling on your friend.

But Heaven 'mongst other blessed things
 Has now denied this one,
 For the sun is shining upon thee,
 The moon upon thy sou.

WRITTEN ON RECOVERING FROM SICKNESS,
SEPT. 1834.

I stood upon the shores of Hindustan,
A solitary man ;
And a voice came pealing across the sea,
Unheard by all but me ;
And the voice said " Up ; and begone my son,
This land is not for thee.

" Why hast thou left thine own sweet country's bowers,
And all its world of flowers ?
Why hast thou left a home of quiet bliss
For such a clime as this ?
Up ; and begone, my son, and quit this land ;
Thou know'st not what it is.

" Why should'st thou leave a shore, where all is
green,
Fresh, lovely, and serene ;
To seek a country far across the sea
Where winds blow parchingly,
And grim disease comes stalking o'er the plain,
Ready to light on thee."

" Dost thou seek glory ?—Why abroad then roam ?
Have we not that at home ?
Dost thou seek riches ?—Oh ! believe me, Son,
That such a goal when won
Will not repay thee for the weary race
Thou, seeking it, hast run "

But stubbornness was in my heart ; and I
Turn'd away silently :
Yet still I could but hear the warning voice—
" Methinks, thou dost rejoice
In this thine exile"—then I answer made
" Alas ! 'twas not my choice."

Much did I marvel what the voice could be,
That thus importuned me ;
And I cried out—" Those tones, oh ! whose are they
That now I hear—oh ! say :
Me-thought at first it was my mother's voice
That thought has died away ;

" And now I know not"—Then the voice replied
" I am thy friend—thy guide—
Thou hast none such throughout this teeming earth ;
E'en from thy very birth,
I have watched o'er thee ; and I charge thee now,
Reseek thy father's hearth."

Then sickness came upon me : and I lay
For many a weary day,
Cursing the hour, when first I saw the light :
At morn I pray'd for night,
And when night came I long'd for day to burst
Upon my straining sight.

Then I had visions, though I never slept,
But aye my senses kept—

Wild, troubled visions which I could not quell,
Although I knew right well,
That my distempered brain saw many things
Which were invisible.

And as I lay upon the bed of pain,
I heard the voice again ;
" My son, dost thou believe me ?"—and I cried
" Oh ! my best friend—my guide—
Whatever thou mayest be, relieve me, and Thou shalt be defied."

Then the voice said—" Thou needest not repine,
The hand, which smote, is mine ;
And I smite whom I love.—Yet I will save
Thy body from the grave ;
And when thou standest up, thou wilt regard
The council which I gave."

And out I spake—" Whatever thou may'st be
Who thus dost counsel me—
Thou unembodied, formless eloquence,
Whence comest thou—oh ! whence ?"—
And the voice answered in the gentlest tones
" My name is PROVIDENCE."

WRITTEN DURING A CALM AT SEA—NOV. 1834.

On the Homeward voyage.

ON ; ON !
Borrow the lightning's speed,
Or the swift pennons of the eagle's wing ;
Bound as the wild deer boundeth o'er the plain ;
A hunted fearful thing.
Thy way is clear—thy path is wide,
Over the sea ;
Dash the huge billows from thy side
With a strong arm of pride ;
Oh ! sluggard ship !—thou art too slow for me.

Let the winds roar,
And the great Ocean's bosom heave and swell
Like a huge monster's—oh ! I love right well
To see the wild waves raging white as snow—
Blue waters are for maidens, not for men—
I glory in the breakers ; for I know,
Oh ! blessed thought, that when
The dark clouds frown upon the glittering foam
Our ship is nearing home.

Smooth waters and bright skies—oh ! not for me—
For gentle ladies sailing on a lake
'Tis pleasant on the surface not to see
A ripple or a break :
When nature all around them is serene,
As aye their hearts have been—
But not for me—oh ! not for me, whose song
Was awakened by affliction, and who long,

In sickness—and in sorrow—and despair,
Have been cast here and there,
Like a vile weed—or any worthless thing—
A lonely man, 'mongst many, wandering
In most unwilling exile o'er the wave,
Which nearly has been—and may be—my grave.

'Tis well—'tis well—I feel the vessel bound
Beneath me ; and a sound,
Like to the noise of waters in commotion,
Comes from the wind-swept ocean
And cleaveth the still air.—Upon my sight,
With a deep sense of exquisite delight,
A bubbling, vein-inwoven track of white—
The rear-ward path-way of our sea-girt car,
Like to a serpent's trail, bursts glistening from afar.

The wine-cup of my spirit's bliss runs o'er ;
And desolation in my soul no more
Holds its accustom'd orgies.—It may be
That still there is some rest in store for me,
And I perchance at last, my journey done,
A weary traveller but a joyful one,
Shall shake the dust from off my feet, and stand
With throbbing heart upon my native land—
More than rewarded for long years of pain
By the first bliss of reaching home again.

I see the forms which will come forth to meet me,
I hear the voices which will sound to greet me ;
I see the fire upon my father's hearth,
And many looks of mirth.
The incense of thanksgiving offer'd up,
The blessing breath'd—the over-flowing cup
Smiling a rosy welcome ; and the eye
Where love is written oh ! so legibly—
The question—and the answer frankly made,
For who in present safety is afraid
To talk of dangers past ?—'twere well to be Tossed for a while upon life's troubled sea.
At last to enter such a port as this—
For what is suffering but the road to bliss ?

SONNET.

BURIAL AT SEA.

On ! 'tis a fearful thing to stand beside
A dead man's coffin on a foreign sea,
And think in dreariest solitude that he
Afar from his own father-land has died,
Without one friend to smooth his dying pillow,
Without one loving eye to shed a tear,
When his soul fled—they gave him to the billow,
Unwept, unhonoured—In the waters drear,
I heard a plunge, and saw the white foam rise,
Then looked around me ; but in no man's eyes
Could I see aught unwonted ; soon we parted,
One here, one there ; but all most joyous-hearted,
A cloud on no one's brow : and can it be,
That scenes like these, weak man, stir up no thought in thee.

MAJOR H. B. HENDERSON*.

EXTRACT FROM "THE CADET."

THE youth was on the Ganges ; 'twas that hour
Of coming evening, when the sinking sun
Lies veil'd in it's own lustre : and it's power
Gives a warm, lingering light ere it be gone :
Rich roll'd the fleecy clouds, and yet they shone
In chasten'd splendour, spreading like a sea,
In wave-like glory. The day-breeze was done,
Fleeting in sighs away, till you might see
Still waters mirroring the bright serenity.

'Twas calmness all : the evening's latest ray
Tinted the bosom of that waveless tide ;
So soft, that as it slowly past away,
'Twas like the blooming languor of a bride
Sinking to gentle sleep, with cheek warm dyed
In love's own roseate hue. Along the stream
The fisher's lessening skiff was seen to glide,
Unurged and careless ; till that it would seem
To melt into the air, like phantom of a dream.

The moon lay pale and lovely in the east,
Like a young mother, timid in the grace
Of beauty, as she scarce unveils her breast,
To give her new-born nurture ! O'er her face,
A few light clouds were fitting ; but apace,
Careering through the skies, she from their height
Silver'd the Moslem's tomb, or sainted place
Of holy Bramin, with her radiance bright ;
Streaming athwart the tide a spangled line of light.

The calm shore slept in peace, unruffled there ;
The moonlit leaves lay stirless on each bough ;
And the tall palm, that tower'd in the air,
Spread its long shadow motionless below :
In mimicry of stars, and glistening through
Each Banian's spreading form, the fire-fly's light
Illumed the deeper foliage : all was now
A scene of softness wooing the fond sight,
The East's one witching hour, its loveliness of night !

Ah me ! there is a softness in that hour ;
A stealing tenderness it well instils ;
Which like the air-harp's sigh from secret bower,
Seizes upon the soul, until our wills
Grow weak in very weeping : all our ills
At such an hour are busy at the heart ;
And yet we love their sorrow, for it kills
The time, so sweetly, that we would not part,
Although we sigh, and sigh, till tears unbidden start.

He sat amidst that loveliness alone,
No stranger nigh to break its holy charm ;
While memory wander'd to each pleasure gone,
Those days of youth, when reckless of alarm,
His moments glided without guile or harm ;
Once more his friends he hail'd, and with them came
The form of her, whom his affections warm
Had singled forth, as they awoke to flame,
To be their leading star, the guardian of their aim.

* Author of "The Bengallee," "The Cadet," and "Heera, or the Maid of the Deekan," &c. &c.

He thought of her, his playmate, till again
 His fancy prest her to a bleeding heart ;
 But clasp'd the form of agonising pain,
 That breathless fell,—and could not dare to part !
 His boyhood pass'd before him, void of art,
 When he was yet so young,—and her soft kiss
 Murmur'd its sweets for him, and could impart
 No thrill but of affection's purer bliss ;
 He sigh'd and ask'd, hath dissipation aught like this ?

DESCRIPTION OF LAILI'.

[From Laili and Majnun; a poem from the original Persian of Nazâmî.]

LAILI' in beauty, softness, grace,
 Surpass'd the loveliest of her race ;
 She was a fresh and odorous flower,
 Pluck'd by a fairy from her bower ;
 With heart-delighting rosebuds blooming,
 The welcome breeze of spring perfuming.
 The killing witchery that lies
 In her soft, black, delicious eyes,
 When gather'd in one amorous glance,
 Pierces the heart, like sword or lance ;
 The prey that falls into her snare,
 For life must mourn and struggle there ;
 Her eyelash speaks a thousand blisses,
 Her lips of ruby ask for kisses ;
 Soft lips where sugar-sweetness dwells,
 Sweet as the bee-hive's honey-cells ;
 Her cheeks, so beautiful and bright,
 Had stole the moon's refulgent light ;
 Her form the cypress-tree expresses,
 And rill and ripe invites caresses ;
 With all these charms the heart to win,
 There was a cureless grief within—
 Yet none beheld her grief, or heard ;
 She droop'd like broken-winged bird.
 Her secret thoughts her love concealing,
 But, softly to the terrace stealing,
 From morn to eve she gazed around,
 In hopes her Majnun might be found,
 Wandering in sight. For she had none
 To sympathise with her—not one !
 None to compassionate her woes—
 In dread of rivals, friends, and foes ;
 And though she smiled, her mind's distress
 Fill'd all her thoughts with bitterness :
 The fire of absence on them prey'd,
 But light nor smoke that fire betray'd :
 Shut up within herself, she sate,
 Absorb'd in grief, disconsolate ;
 Yet true love has resources still,
 Its soothing arts, and ever will !

Voices in guarded softness rose .
 Upon her ever-listening ear ;
 She heard her constant lover's woes,
 In melting strains, repeated near ;

* Author of "An Abridgement in prose and verse of the Shah Nameh of Ferdousi;" "La Secchia Rapita, from the Italian of Tassoni," &c. &c.

The sky, with gloomy clouds o'erspread,
 At length soft showers began to shed ;
 And what, before, destruction seem'd,
 With rays of better promise gleam'd.

Voices of young and old she heard
 Beneath the harem-walls reciting
 Her Majnun's songs ; each thrilling word
 Her almost broken heart delighting.

Laili, with matchless charms of face,
 Was bless'd with equal mental grace ;
 With eloquence and taste refined :
 And from the treasures of her mind
 She pour'd her fondest love's confession
 With faithful love's most warm expression ;
 Told all her hopes and sorrows o'er,
 Though told a thousand times before ;
 The life-blood circling through her veins
 Recorded her affecting strains ;
 And as she wrote, with passion flush'd,
 The glowing words with crimson blush'd.
 And now the terrace she ascends
 In secret, o'er the rampart bends,
 And flings the record, with a sigh,
 To one that moment passing by :
 Unmark'd the stranger gains the prize,
 And from the spot like lightning flies
 To where the lingering lover weeps unseen.
 —Starting upon his feet, with cheerful mien,
 He gazes, reads, devours the pleasing tale,
 And joy again illumines his features pale.

BARRACKPORE.

January, 1834.

THERE was a time, not many years ago,
 When Barrackpore with festive pleasure rung ;
 When plays, and balls, and martial pomp and show,
 Around the scene a magic influence flung.

When wit, and humour, jollity, and glee,
 And sporting joys enlivened every day ;
 When all were hospitable, kind, and free,
 And rolled, on swiftest wing, the hours away.

But now,—how changed ! a carcass uninspired,
 A body without soul,—a mournful place—
 Should a Memento Mori be desired,
 'Tis here !—no life within it can you trace.

The Bungalows,—brown pyramids of grass,—
 Look sad, though tenanted, and seem to be
 Caves of Trophonius ; voiceless caves, alas !
 Where never breathe the sounds of revelry.

Then what may be the boast of Barrackpore ?
 Is nothing left to please the ear or sight ?
 'Yes ! you may hear the gun at day-light roar ;—
 What else ? 'Again at eight o'clock at night !'

DESCRIPTION OF ROODABUH.

From the Shah Nameh.

HER name Roodabuh : screened from public view,
 Her countenance is brilliant as the sun ;
 From head to foot her lovely form is fair
 As polished ivory. Like the spring, her cheek
 Presents a radiant bloom ; in stature tall,
 And o'er her silvery brightness, richly flows
 Dark musky ringlets clustering to her feet.
 She blushes like the rich pomegranate flower ;
 Her eyes are soft and sweet as the narcissus,
 Her lashes from the raven's jetty plume
 Have stolen their blackness, and her brows are bent
 Like archer's bow. Ask ye to see the moon ?
 Look at her face : seek ye for musky fragrance ?
 She is all sweetness. Her long fingers seem Pencils of silver, and so beautiful
 Her presence, that she breathes of heaven and love.

W. F. THOMPSON*.

THE JOGI'S ADDRESS TO THE GANGES.

DREAD power, beside thy sacred wave,
 We meet as ever now ;
 To thee we pray, for thee we lave,
 But where, oh where art thou !
 The charmed lamp floats trembling by,
 And braves the tempest's burst ;
 'Tis thus for thee we burn and die,
 But let us find thee first.

I've sought thee in the cell of stone
 From which thy waters rise ;
 I've sought thee where thy icy throne
 Is lost amid the skies ;
 And where the sister current meets
 Thine own in billowy jar ;
 In Cashee's ancient dark retreats,
 In wild and lone Hurdwar ;

I've shouted where thy torrent boiled,
 I've slumbered where it slept,
 From eager youth, to age o'ertoiled,
 I've looked for thee and wept ;
 Where'er thy sacred wave is drunk,
 In every haunted spot,
 I've sought thee—till my spirit sunk,
 For oh ! I found thee not.

And still in holy dream I pace
 Thy sands the livelong day,
 And pray that our and thy disgrace,
 May quickly pass away ;
 And oft I look, but still in vain,
 To see thy hoary head,
 In all an injured God's disdain,
 Uprising from thy bed.

And when upon thy glassy stream,
 Descends the glow of even,
 It seems—oh does it only seem—
 Thy wave to mix with heaven :

I thither bend my ardent gaze,
 Till every hue be past,
 Assured that in that radiant blaze,
 Thou wilt descend at last.

And in the solemn hour of night,
 Where Nature's pulse has died,
 With many a dark and nameless rite,
 I hunt thy gloomy tide,
 And oft I lift my voice on high,
 To chaunt the magic line,
 And start at echo's far reply,
 Half dreading it is thine.

And now chill age begins to creep
 In languor thro' my blood,
 And soon I seek thee—low and deep,
 Beneath thy gushing flood :
 But oh not yet—for still I yearn,
 And still I look to see,
 The splendours of the past return,
 And all bow down to thee.—

Say is it that thou loath'st the land
 Where pallid mullicks reign ?
 Then aid, oh aid our feeble hands,
 Or we shall fight in vain :
 For think not that we tamely bow,
 To be the things we are,
 No, they are strong—but Ganges thou,
 Oh thou art stronger far.

Lost is our sway, our land, our name.
 Low—low beneath the yoke,
 Our spirits bend in grief and shame,
 Oh haste ere they be broke.
 From Himalay to Serendeepe,
 Ascends one endless prayer,
 Thou canst not die—thou canst not sleep,
 Then where art thou—oh where ?

THE RAJPOOT'S LAMENT.

SHADES of the mighty, mighty dead,
 Then have ye lived and died in vain ?
 And are ye fled, for ever fled,
 With all the glories of your reign,
 And left the world ye used to bless,
 In guilt as deep—in need no less—
 Than when ye burst upon its guilt,
 And half the blood it bore was spilt ?

The Keytrie's pride—the Brahmin's god—
 Shall both be trampled and o'erthrown ?
 And the pure land your footsteps trod,
 Stoop to a race to you unknown ;
 And will ye sleep, for ever sleep,
 While good men pray, and brave ones weep,
 And native honour's latest gasp,
 Is ebbing in the oppressor's grasp ?

Whose foot is on the Brahmin's land ?
 A foot the country hath not born.
 Whose hand is on the soldier brand ?
 A hand the soldier holds in scorn.
 Whose lance is in the country's heart ?
 A lance more odious than its smart.
 Who fill the thrones ye reared of old ?
 The slaves of slaves, whose God is gold.

Soft Gunga checks her troubled wave,
 And slave-like weeps with veiled brow ;
 'Twas there, 'twas there ye bid us lave,
 And will ye, can ye bid us now ?
 The pomp and pride of native sway,
 Our lands, our names have past away,
 And will ye never, never aid,
 To guard the rights your glory made.

Shades of the mighty, who shall dare
 To say ye are not mighty still ?
 Your whispers breathe in every air,
 You spirits move in every thrill—
 Dim—thro' the misty gulf of years—
 Dun—thro' the glimmering veil of tears—
 I see ye—warriors stern and grey,
 I see ye—but no other may.

I breathed it to the rushing flood,
 The water's murmuring voice replied ;
 I breathed it to the waving wood,
 The conscious branches bowed and sighed ;
 I told the rock, I told the cloud,
 And they returned it doubly loud ;
 I spoke it in the haunts of men,
 And not a voice was heard again.

Supernatural spirits—YE could mould,
 And re-create a nation's mind ;
 And will no whispering voice unfold,
 The magic art that rules mankind ?
 Oh I have mused on all ye taught,
 Till my young heart grew old with thought,
 But never yet that sacred gleam
 Has reached my soul in thought or dream.

'Tis vain, the task is not for me ;
 Fly, dreamy hopes and shadowy throne ;
 My country's soul I cannot free,
 I WILL be master of my own ;
 Shades of the mighty—yet, oh yet
 Shed o'er this heart the proud regret
 That throbs and thrills in every beat,
 A little while, and we shall meet.

Tho' ear is deaf, and voice is dumb,
 I know the spirit dieth not ;
 The ocean sleeps, the storm shall come,
 When I perchance shall be forgot ;
 Enough for me if freedom's eyes,
 Shall glisten where my ashes lie,
 And freedom's tardy hand confer,
 A wreath on him who died for her.

LINES ON A SWEET BRIAR IN INDIA.

DEAR flow'ret of my native land,
 How sweet thy leaves of tend'rest green
 Beneath these tropic skies expand,
 Excelling all the mighty scene ;
 And oh, midst India's richer bloom,
 How sweet thy home-fraught mild perfume ?

It tells of childhood's blissful day,
 Ere yet one pang from sorrow griev'd us,
 Or dimm'd the breast's unclouded ray
 Ere Love betray'd—or friends deceiv'd us—
 Ere youth came on with all its snares,
 Or manhood brought its chilling cares.

It tells of summer's evening walk
 When hush'd the summer's evening show'r ;
 And raptur'd lovers whisper'd talk
 Was sweet beneath thy scented bow'r ;
 When Life's 'young love' was love alone,
 A glow in after years unknown.

It tells of summer Sabbath morn
 When by the village wayside blowing
 Thy fragrance on the air was borne
 A holiness around bestowing ;
 And something more than earthly calm
 Seen'd mingl'd with thy breathing balm.

With me on exile's desert cast,
 I'll cherish thee, my native flow'r,
 For tho' thou can'st not give the past
 Thy fragrance can the scene restore ;
 And oh, the balm for present pain
 Is living o'er past joys again.

JAMES HUTCHINSON†.

THE PINDAREE'S SONG.

THE steed paws the ground, with a snort, and a neigh,
 The Pindaree has mounted, and hied him away ;
 He has braced on his shield, and his sword by his side,
 And forth he has gone, on a foray, to ride.

His turban is twisted and wreath'd round his brow,
 Its color as red as his blood in its glow ;
 From his shoulder, behind him, his carbine is slung,
 And light, o'er his saddle, his long spear is hung.

Loose streams to the wind, his white flowing garb,
 And gaily bedeck'd is his Dukhunnee barb ;
 To the bells, at his neck, that chime as they ride,
 His charger is bounding, and prancing in pride.

His comrades are joined, they are mounted alike ;
They must drink, they must smoke, 'ere their tents
they will strike—

Their tents did I say?—they are spangled, and high,
Their beds are the ground, and their curtains the sky.

Thro' the jungle, they wend ; till they reach the broad stream ;
It is shallow eno', and they cross, in the gleam,
Of a moon shining sweet, as the smile, on the face
Of the maiden, we love, and would die to embrace.

The river is forded, the frontier is passed,
And they reach the lone village, by midnight, at last ;
Would you gather its fate ? in the darkness of night,
The forests around it are red in its light.

Its dwellers have fled, in the wild woods to roam ;
All roofless, and black, is the place of their home ;
And their daughters, dishonored, are weeping in
vain,
Nor will boast of their pride, and their scornings,
again.

TUHIMEENUH.

From the Shah Nameh.

Lo ! as he slumbered on his bed of state
Roostum, the champion, dreamt, with wine elate,
That Tuhimeenuh came, in beauty's pride,
And stood with graceful person at his side.
He dreamt that she, the sceptred sovereign's child,
Fair as the sun and like him undefiled,
Came with a slave as beautiful as night,
Whose hand sustained an amber-scented light,
Whose feet her steps, with meen superior, led
Close to the pillow of his sopha-steed.
He dreamt that from her screen advanced, with grace,
A female like the moon, that seemed in face,
In brightness like the sun ; who breathed perfume
Replete with fragrance and with sweetest bloom ;
Who boasted of a figure full of state,
Tall as a cypress and in stature straight ;
Who had two eyebrows curving like one bow ;
Who had two curls as snares for friend and foe,
For, bought in realms of paradise, these locks
Were like two twigs of amber perfumed box ;
Or black chain armoury, thou wouldst have said,
Knot bound on knot, and braid entwined in braid.
Who had two cheeks and temples like two roses,
Commingling with a bed of lily-posies—
Who had two rows of necklace thou mightst fancy
A casket full of occult necromancy ;
For, in the double strings, the holes were wrought
As punctured by the diamond cut of thought—
Who had ten fingers, each a silvery pen,
An hundred fragrant lines traced o'er the ten !
Who from her lips dropped honey, from her tongue
Shed sugary sweets, and round her mouth had strung

* Translator of the Shah Nameh, &c.

Rows of transcendent pearls in rubies set
Formed in proportion and in order met !
Who wore the tip and circle of each ear
Refulgent as the sun, as bright and clear,
And had appended from them many a gem
In clusters sparkling 'neath her diadem !
But midst this blaze of beauty and of stones
Nocturnal jewel-stars forsook their zones,
Excepting Venus who alone that night
Stayed as a friend administering her light
To her whose soul was intellect, whose frame
Embodied spirit chaste as seraph's claim,
And whose untainted nature from her worth
Thou wouldst have deemed too pure to hold of earth.

A BENGAL PICTURE.

PAINT now an azure sky without a cloud ;
Throw in the distance mists and jungle shade ;
Sketch tall thin trunks faint gleaming from the glade,
And cocoa-nuts high tow'ring, plumed and proud.
Beneath shall be a hovel, and a crowd
Of bronzed dwellers, where the thatch doth fade
From golden yellow to each dingy grade,
And blue smoke curls about till it doth shroud
The idle groups. Next on the foreground see
Two ragged horses just released from toil,
Browsing upon the fragrant straw wisps, while
The creaking carriage waits for company.
Now add a sunshine varnish. There—'tis done ;
A Bengal sketch—not sooner seen than known.

MAJOR CALDER CAMPBELL†.

SONNET—THE SHOOL DAGON, RANGOON.

Oh ! it is splendid, this—a glorious gleam
Of fairy land ! while now the rising sun
Pours o'er the forests one rich glowing stream
Of beauty and of light !—doth it not stun
Each sense, to view that bright, aspiring dome,
Lifting its golden pride so high in air,
And, like a lighted pyre of glory, there
Gleaming in might and majesty ?—but, come,
Ascend the platform—now,—oh heavens ! how grand
A pile is this to grace a heathen land !
And all around how beautiful !—the foam
Of seas and rivers,—hills, and woods, and lakes,
And every form fantastic nature takes,
Here shine upon the eye,—a scene most brightly
fair ?

† Though Major Campbell's first published volume of poems is entitled "Lays from the East," it contains no poems of an Eastern or local cast ; and I have found after some search in periodicals no more than the above little pieces of his that are of an Oriental character.—Compiler.

SONNETS :—BEEJAPORE.

I.

HIGH from the top of this imperial dome,
 I view with wond'ring gaze the City round,
 Where robed in splendid ruin, strew the ground
 The regal hall, the Temple, and the Tomb!
 The setting sun contrasts with deeper gloom
 Those tamarind groves that speck the eastern space,
 And gilds those glittering spires with richer grace
 That decorate the western prospect;—some
 Tinged with a blush of purple!—Oh, there steals
 Over the heart an awe!—a soothing tone
 Of pensive feeling o'er the mind is thrown,
 Which revels in the 'joy of grief' it feels,
 To think that all this wilderness sublime
 Should glean such beauty from the hand of Time!

II.

For oh! methinks that now, ev'n when they fall
 In clustered groups, these edifices grand
 Have more of beauty, than when here the hand
 Of power and population ruled o'er all!
 For now the hum of men, the shout, the cry,
 The rush of horsemen, and each various sound,
 Have ceased to vex the ear: and sweetly round
 Falls, with a mellow cadence echoing by,
 The voice of the Muezzin,—who below
 Calls, vainly calls, 'the Faithful' to their rites;
 For oh! the humble train he now invites
 A few and all regardless;—thus decay
 Attends all human things, which gleam and glow
 In worldly pride—but glow to fade away!

MISS EMMA ROBERTS*.

UPON the Ganges' regal stream,
 The sun's bright splendours rest,
 And gorgeously the noon-tide beam
 Reposes on its breast:
 But in a small secluded nook,
 Beyond the western sea,
 There rippling glides a narrow brook,
 That's dearer far to me.

The cory perches on my hand,
 Caressing to be fed,
 And spreads its plumes at my command,
 And stoops its purple head;
 But where the robin, humble guest,
 Comes flying from the tree,
 Which bears its unpretending nest,
 Alas! I'd rather be.

The fire-fly flashes through the sky,
 A meteor swift and bright;
 And the wide space around, on high,
 Glams with its emerald light;
 Though glory tracks that shooting star,
 And bright its splendours shine,
 The glow-worm's lamp is dearer far
 To this sad heart of mine.

Throughout the summer year, the flowers
 In all the flush of bloom,
 Clustering around the forest bowers,
 Exhale their rich perfume.
 The daisy, and the primrose pale,
 Though scentless they may be,
 That gem a far, far distant vale,
 Are much more prized by me.

The lotus opes its chalice,
 Upon the tank's broad lake,
 Where India's stately palaces
 Their ample mirrors make:
 But reckless of each tower and dome,
 The splendid and the grand,
 I languish for a cottage home,
 Within my native land.

THE DYING HINDOO.

HE lies beside the sacred river,
 His heart has lost life's ruddy glow,
 His sighs are faint, his pulses quiver,
 And death's chill damps are on his brow.

Within yon green and bowery glade
 Whose path the smile of sunshine wears,
 Beneath the lofty palm tree's shade
 His loved though lowly hut appears.

And near him well known sounds arise
 With joyous songs and laughter fraught,
 And now his glazed and languid eyes
 Are turned towards the village-ghaut.

There all is cheerful, as of yore,
 When with the sun's declining beam
 He too had sought the Ganges' shore,
 And bathed within its hallowed stream.

In crowds his early friends repair
 To the chabouta's esplanade,
 Her graceful ghurrah filling there,
 Stoops to the brink his dark-eyed maid.

They heed him not—no fond farewells
 Attest their grief, no tears are shed,
 No sigh the heart's deep anguish tells;
 He to the living world is dead.

One pang has shot across his breast—
 One human pang—but it is gone,
 And tranquilly he sinks to rest,
 As the eternal wave flows on.

His eye the blushing wreath has caught
 Which floats along the sacred wave,
 And to his parting soul has brought Hopes of bright lands beyond the grave.

Soon shall the form o'er that pure tide
 Which now to earth so fondly clings,
 Freed from each grovelling trammel glide,
 And mingle with its holy springs.

The red crown of the lotus wreath
Upon the molten silver blushes,
And a dark, lifeless form beneath
With the stream's headlong-current rushes.

The corse, the flower are seen no more,
For ever lost in yon bright river,
The echoes of the lonely shore
In mournful tone repeat—for ever!

POEMS BY AN EAST INDIAN.

HENRY LOUIS VIVIAN DEROZIO*.

TO INDIA—MY NATIVE LAND.

Born 1809—Died 1831.

(Introduction to the Fakeer of Jungheera.)

My country! in thy day of glory past
A beauteous halo circled round thy brow,
And worshipped as a deity thou wast—
Where is that glory, where that reverence now?
Thy eagle pinion is chained down at last.
And grovelling in the lowly dust art thou:
Thy minstrel hath no wreath to weave for thee
Save the sad story of thy misery!—
Well—let me dive into the depths of time,
And bring from out the ages that have rolled
A few small fragments of those wrecks sublime,
Which human eye may never more behold;
And let the querdon of my labour be
My fallen country! one kind wish for thee!

SONNET TO THE STUDENTS AT THE HINDU COLLEGE†.

EXPANDING, like the petals of young flowers;
I watch the gentle opening of your minds,
And the sweet loosening of the spell that binds
Your intellectual energies and powers,
That stretch, (like young birds in soft summer hours)
Their wings to try their strength. O! how the winds
Of circumstance, and freshening April showers
Of early knowledge, and unnumbered kinds
Of new perceptions shed their influence;
And how you worship Truth's omnipotence!
What joyance rains upon me, when I see
Fame, in the mirror of futurity,
Weaving the chaplets you are yet to gain—
And then I feel I have not lived in vain.

ODE.

FROM THE PERSIAN OF HAFIZ.

Freely translated.

SAY, what's the rose without the smile
Of her I deem more fair,
And what are all the sweets of spring
If wine be wanting there?

* Author of the "Fakeer of Jungheera," &c.

† Mr. Derozio was one of the masters of the Hindu College.

O! who will pause the choice to doubt
Of walks where music rings,
Or bowers in richest bloom without
The notes the Bulbul sings?
In vain the cypress waves, in vain
A thousand flowrets sigh,
Without the cheek whose tint excels
The tulip's crimson dye!
Yet what are lips where sweetness clings,
And cheeks where roses dwell,
Without the kiss, the joy, the bliss
Of pleasure's potent spell?
The wine and garden both are sweet,
But sweetest wine and grove
I lothe, if there I cannot meet
The face and form I love.
The brightest, fairest works of art
That skilful hands devise
Are nought, without the hand and heart
Of her I fondest prize.
And what's my life?—perhaps a coin—
A trifling coin at best—
Unheeded e'en by pusser-by,
Unfit for bridal guest*.

POEM BY A HINDU.

KASIPRASHAD GHOSH†.

THE BOATMEN'S SONG TO GANGA.

GOLD river! gold river! how gallantly now
Our bark on thy bright breast is lifting her prow,
In the pride of her beauty, how swiftly she flies:
Like a white-winged spirit thro' topaz-paved skies.

Gold river! gold river! thy bosom is calm,
And o'er thee, the breezes are shedding their balm:
And Nature beholds her fair features portrayed,
In the glass of thy bosom—serenely displayed.

Gold river! gold river! the sun to thy waves,
Is fleeing to rest in thy cool coral caves;
And thence, with his war of light, at the morn
He will rise, and the skies with his glory adorn.

Gold river! gold river! how bright is the beam,
Which brightens and crimsones thy soft flowing stream;
Whose waters beneath make a musical clashing,
Whose ripples like dimples in childhood are flashing.

Gold river! gold river! the moon will soon grace,
The hall of the stars with her light-shedding face:
The wandering planets her palace will throng,
And seraphs will waken their music and song.

Gold river! gold river! our brief course is done,
And safe in the city our home we have won;
And now as the bright sun who drops from our view,
So Ganga, we bid thee a cheerful adieu!

* This alludes to a custom in the East, of throwing money away among the guests at a bridal.

SPECIMENS OF AMERICAN POETRY.

THE WESTERN WORLD.

By William Cullen Bryant.

LATE, from this western shore, that morning chased
The deep and ancient night, that threw its shroud
O'er the green land of groves, the beautiful waste,
Nurse of full streams, and lifter up of proud
Sky-mingling mountains that o'erlook the cloud.
Erewhile, where yon gay spirits their brightness
rear,
Trees waved, and the brown hunter's shouts were loud
Amid the forest ; and the bounding deer
Fled at the glancing plume, and the gaunt wolf yelled near.

And where his willing waves yon bright blue bay
Sends up, to kiss his decorated brim,
And cradles, in his soft embrace, the gay
Young group of grassy islands born of him,
And, crowding nigh, or in the distance dim,
Lifts the white throng of sails, that bear or bring
The commerce of the world—with tawny limb,
And belt and beads in sunlight glistening,
The savage urged his skiff like wild bird on the wing.

Then, all his youthful paradise around,
And all the broad and boundless mainland, lay
Cooled by the interminable wood, that frowned
O'er mound and vale, where never summer ray
Glanced, till the strong tornado broke his way
Through the gray giants of the sylvan wild ;
Yet many a sheltered glade, with blossoms gay,
Beneath the showery sky and sunshine mild,
Within the shaggy arms of that dark forest smiled.

There stood the Indian hamlet, there the lake Spread its blue sheet, that flashed with many an oar,
Where the brown otter plunged him from the brake,
And the deer drank—as the light gale flew o'er,
The twinkling maize-field rustled on the shore ;
And while that spot, so wild, and lone, and fair,
A look of glad and innocent beauty wore,
And peace was on the earth and in the air,
The warrior lit the pile, and bound his captive there :

Not unavenged—the foeman, from the wood,
Beheld the deed, and, when the midnight shade
Was stillest, gorged his battle-axe with blood ;
All died—the wailing babe—the shrieking maid—
And in the flood of fire that scathed the glade,
The roofs went down ; but deep the silence grew
When on the dewy woods the day-beam played ;
No more the cabin smokes rose wreathed and blue,
And ever by their lake lay moored the light canoe.

5 K

Look now abroad—another race has filled
These populous borders—wide the wood recedes,
And towns shoot up, and fertile realms are tilled ;
The land is full of harvests and green meads ;
Streams numberless, that many a fountain feeds,
Shine, disembowered, and give to sun and breeze
Their virgin waters ; the full region leads
New colonies forth, that toward the western seas
Spread, like a rapid flame among the autumnal trees.

Here the free spirit of mankind, at length,
Throws its last fetters off ; and who shall place
A limit to the giant's unchained strength,
Or curb his swiftness in the forward race.
Far, like the comet's way through infinite space,
Stretches the long untravelled path of light
Into the depths of ages : we may trace,
Afar, the brightening glory of its flight,
Till the receding rays are lost to human sight.

POWER OF THE SOUL IN INVESTING EXTERNAL CIRCUMSTANCES WITH THE HUE OF ITS OWN FEELINGS.

By Richard H. Dana.

—LIFE in itself, it life to all things gives ;
For whatsoever it looks on, that thing lives—
Becomes an acting being, ill or good ;
And, grateful to its giver, tenders food
For the soul's health, or, suffering change unblest,
Pours poison down to rankle in the breast :
As is the man, e'en so it bears its part,
And answers, thought to thought, and heart to heart.

Yes, man reduplicates himself. You see,
In yonder lake, reflected rock and tree.
Each leaf at rest, or quivering in the air,
Now rests, now stirs, as if a breeze were there
Sweeping the crystal depths. How perfect all !
And see those slender top-boughs rise and fall ;
The double strips of silvery sand unite
Above, below, each grain distinct and bright.—
Thou bird, that seek'st thy food upon that bough,
Peck not alone ; that bird below, as thou,
Is busy after food, and happy, too—
They're gone ! Both, pleased, away together flew.

And see we thus sent up, rock, sand, and wood,
Life, joy, and motion from the sleepy flood ?
The world, O man, is like that flood to thee :
Turn where thou wilt, thyself in all things see Reflected back. As drives the blinding sand
Round Egypt's piles, where'er thou tak'st thy stand,
If that thy heart be barren, there will sweep
The drifting waste, like waves along the deep,

Fill up the vale, and choke the laughing streams
That ran by grass and brake, with dancing beams;
Sear the fresh woods, and from thy heavy eye
Veil the wide-shifting glories of the sky,
And one still, sightless level make the earth,
Like thy dull, lonely, joyless soul,—a dearth.

The rill is tuneless to his ear, who feels
No harmony within; the south wind steals
As silent as unseen amongst the leaves.
Who has no inward beauty, none perceives,
Though all around is beautiful. Nay, more—
In nature's calmest hour, he hears the roar
Of winds and flinging waves—puts out the light,
When high and angry passions meet in fight;
And, his own spirit into tumult hurled,
He makes a turmoil of a quiet world:
The fiends of his own bosom people air
With kindred fiends, that hunt him to despair.
Hates he his fellow-men? Why, then, he deems
'Tis hate for hate:—as he, so each one seems.

Soul! fearful is thy power, which thus transforms
All things into its likeness; heaves in storms
The strong, proud sea, or lays it down to rest,
Like the hushed infant on its mother's breast—
Which gives each outward circumstance its hue,
And shapes all others' acts and thoughts anew,
That so, they joy, or love, or hate, impart,
As joy, love, hate, holds rule within the heart.

INDEPENDENCE.

By J. K. Paulding.

(From "The Backwoodsman.")

O, INDEPENDENCE! man's bright mental sun,
With blood and tears by our brave country won,
Parent of all, high-mettled man adorns,
The nerve of steel, the soul that meanness scorns,
The mounting wind that spurns the tyrant's sway,
The eagle eye that mocks the God of day,
Turns on the lordly upstart scorn for scorn,
And drops its lid to none of woman born!
With blood, and tears, and hardships thou wert bought,

Yet rich the blessings thy bright sway has wrought;
Hence comes it that a gallant spirit reigns
Unknown among old Europe's hapless swains,
Who slaves to some proud lord, himself a slave,
From sire to son, from cradle to the grave,
From race to race, more dull and servile grow,
Until at last they nothing feel or know.
Hence comes it, that our meanest farmer's boy
Aspires to taste the proud and manly joy
That springs from holding in his own dear right
The land he ploughs, the home he seeks at night;
And hence it comes, he leaves his friends and home,
Mid distant wilds and dangers drear to roam,
To seek a competence, or find a grave,
Rather than live a hireling or a slave.
As the bright waving harvest field he sees,
Like sunny ocean rippling in the breeze.

And hears the lowing herd, the lambkins' bleat,
Fall on his ear in mingled concert sweet,
His heart sits lightly on its rustic throne,
The fields, the herds, the flocks are all his own.

DESCRIPTION OF A SULTRY SUMMER'S NOON. Carlos Wilcox.

A SULTRY noon, not in the summer's prime,
When all is fresh with life, and youth, and bloom,
But near its close, when vegetation stops,
And fruits mature stand ripening in the sun,
Soothes and enervates with its thousand charms,
Its images of silence and of rest,
The melancholy mind. The fields are still;
The husbandman has gone to his repast,
And, that partaken, on the coolest side
Of his abode, reclines, in sweet repose.
Deep in the shaded stream the cattle stand,
The flocks beside the fence, with heads all prone,
And panting quick. The fields, for harvest ripe,
No breezes bend in smooth and graceful waves,
While with their motion, dim and bright by turns,
The sunshine seems to move; nor e'en a breath
Brushes along the surface with a shade
Fleeting and thin, like that of flying smoke.
The slender stalks their heavy bended heads
Support as motionless as oaks their tops.
O'er all the woods the topmost leaves are still;
E'en the wild poplar leaves, that, pendent hung
By stems elastic, quiver at a breath,
Rest in the general calm. The thistle down,
Seen high and thick, by gazing up beside
Some shading object, in a silver shower
Plumb down, and slower than the slowest snow,
Through all the sleepy atmosphere descends;
And where it lights, though on the steepest roof,
Or smallest spire of grass, remains unmoved.
White as a fleece, as dense and as distinct
From the resplendent sky, a single cloud
On the soft bosom of the air becalmed,
Drops a lone shadow as distinct and still,
On the bare plain, or sunny mountain's side;
Or in the polished mirror of the lake,
In which the deep reflected sky appears
A calm, sublime immensity below.

THANATOPSIS.

William Cullen Bryant.

To him who in the love of Nature holds
Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
A various language; for his gayer hours
She has a voice of gladness, and a smile
And eloquence of beauty, and she glides
Into his darker musings, with a mild
And gentle sympathy, that steals away
Their sharpness, ere he is aware.—When thoughts
Of the last bitter hour come like a blight
Over thy spirit, and sad images
Of the stern agony, and shroud, and pall,
And breathless darkness, and the narrow house,
Make thee to shudder, and grow sick at heart;—
Go forth under the open sky, and list

To Nature's teachings, while from all around—
 Earth and her waters, and the depths of air,—
 Comes a still voice—yet a few days, and thee
 The all-beholding sun shall see no more
 In all his course ; nor yet in the cold ground,
 Where thy pale form was laid, with many tears,
 Nor in the embrace of ocean shall exist
 Thy image. Earth that nourish'd thee, shall claim
 Thy growth, to be resolv'd to earth again :
 And, lost each human trace, surrend'ring up
 Thine individual being, shalt thou go
 To mix for ever with the elements,
 To be a brother to th' insensible rock,
 And to the sluggish clod, which the rude swain
 Turns with his share, and treads upon. The oak
 Shall send his roots abroad, and pierce thy mould.
 Yet not to thy eternal resting place
 Shalt thou retire alone—nor could'st thou wish
 Couch more magnificent. Thou shalt lie down
 With patriarchs of the infant world—with kings,
 The powerful of the earth—the wise, the good,
 Fair forms, and hoary seers of ages past,
 All in one mighty sepulchre. The hills
 Rock-ribb'd and ancient as the sun,—the vales
 Stretching in pensive quietness between
 The venerable woods—rivers that move
 In majesty, and the complaining brooks
 That make the meadows green—and, poured round
 all,

Old Ocean's grey and melancholy waste,—
 Are but the solemn decorations all
 Of the great tomb of man. The golden sun,
 The planet, all the infinite host of heaven,
 Are shining on the sad abodes of death,
 Through the still lapse of ages. All that tread
 The globe, are but a handful to the tribes
 That slumber in its bosom.—Take the wings
 Of morning, and the Barcan desert pierce,
 Or lose thyself in the continuous woods
 Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound
 Save his own dashings—yet, the dead are there,
 And millions in those solitudes, since first
 The flight of years began, have laid them down
 In their last sleep—the dead reign there alone.
 So shalt thou rest—and what if thou shalt fall
 Unnotic'd by the living—and no friend
 Take note of thy departure ! All that breathe
 Will share thy destiny ; the gay will laugh
 When thou art gone, the solemn brood of care
 Plod on, and each one as before will chase
 His favorite phantom ; yet all these shall leave
 Their mirth and their employments, and shall come
 And make their bed with thee ; as the long train
 Of ages glide away, the sons of men,
 The youth in life's green spring, and he who goes
 In the full strength of years, matron, and maid,
 The bow'd with age, the infant in the smiles
 And beauty of its innocent age cut off,—
 Shall one by one be gathered to thy side,
 By those, who in their turn shall follow them.
 So live, that when thy summons comes to join
 The innumerable caravan, that moves
 To the pale realms of shade, where each shall take
 His chamber in the silent halls of death.

Thou go not, like the quarry slave at night,
 Scourg'd to his dungeon, but sustain'd and sooth'd
 By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave,
 Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
 About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

DESCRIPTION OF THE QUIET ISLAND, FROM THE POEM
 OF "THE BUCCANIER."

Richard H. Dana.

THE island lies nine leagues away.
 Along its solitary shore,
 Of craggy rock and sandy bay,
 No sound but ocean's roar,
 Save where the bold, wild sea-bird makes her home,
 Her shrill cry coming through the sparkling foam.

But when the light winds lie at rest,
 And on the glassy, heaving sea,
 The black duck, with her glossy breast,
 Sits swinging silently,
 How beautiful ! No ripples break the reach,
 And silvery waves go noiseless up the beach.

And inland rests the green, warm dell ;
 The brook comes tinkling down its side ;
 From out the trees the Sabbath bell
 Rings cheerful, far and wide,
 Mingling its sound with bleatings of the flocks,
 That feed about the vale amongst the rocks.

Nor holy bell, nor pastoral bleat,
 In former days within the vale ;
 Flapped in the bay the pirate's sheet ;
 Curses were on the gale ;
 Rich goods lay on the sand, and murdered men ;
 Pirate and wrecker kept their revels then.

But calm, low voices, words of grace,
 Now slowly fall upon the ear ;
 A quiet look is in each face,
 Subdued and holy fear :
 Each motion's gentle ; and is kindly done—
 Come, listen, how from crime this isle was won.

ON THE LOSS OF PROFESSOR FISHER.

J. G. C. Brainard.

THE breath of air, that stirs the harp's soft string,
 Floats on to join the whirlwind and the storm ;
 The drops of dew, exhaled from flowers of spring,
 Rise, and assume the tempest's threatening form ;
 The first mild beam of morning's glorious sun,
 Ere night, is sporting in the lightning's flash ;
 And the smooth stream, that flows in quiet on,
 Moves but to aid the overwhelming dash
 That wave and wind can muster, when the might
 Of earth, and air, and sea, and sky unite.
 So science whispered in thy charmed ear,
 And radiant learning beckoned thee away.
 The breeze was music to thee, and the clear
 Beam of thy morning promised a bright day.
 And they have wrecked thee !—But there is a shore
 Where storms are hushed, where tempests never rage ;

Where angry skies and blackening seas no more
 With gusty strength their roaring warfare wage
 By thee its peaceful margin shall be trod—
 Thy home is heaven, and thy Friend is God.

TO THE EVENING WIND.

William Cullen Bryant.

SPIRIT that breathest through my lattice, thou
 That cool'st the twilight of the sultry day,
 Gratefully flows thy freshness round my brow;
 Thou hast been out upon the deep at play,
 Riding all day the wild blue waves till now,
 Roughening their crests, and scattering high their
 spray,
 And swelling the white sail. I welcome thee
 To the scorched land, thou wanderer of the sea!

Nor I alone—a thousand bosoms round
 Inhale thee in the fulness of delight;
 And languid forms rise up, and pulses bound
 Livelier, at coming of the wind of night;
 And, languishing to hear thy grateful sound,
 Lies the vast inland stretched beyond the sight.
 Go forth into the gathering shade; go forth,
 God's blessing breathed upon the fainting earth!

Go, rock the little wood-bird in his nest,
 Curl the still waters, bright with stars, and rouse
 The wide old wood from his majestic rest,
 Summoning from the innumerable boughs
 The strange, deep harmonies that haunt his breast;
 Pleasant shall be thy way where meekly bows
 The shutting flower, and darkling waters pass,
 And 'twixt the o'ershadowing branches and the grass.

The faint old man shall lean his silver head
 To feel thee; thou shalt kiss the child asleep,
 And dry the moistened curls that overspread
 His temples, while his breathing grows more deep;
 And they who stand about the sick man's bed,
 Shall joy to listen to thy distant sweep,
 And softly part his curtains to allow
 Thy visit, grateful to his burning brow.

Go—but the circle of eternal change,
 That is the life of nature, shall restore,
 With sounds and scents from all thy mighty range,
 Thee to thy birth-place of the deep once more;
 Sweet odours in the sea-air, sweet and strange,
 Shall tell the home-sick mariner of the shore;
 And listening to thy murmur, he shall deem
 He hears the rustling leaf and running stream.

 SPRING.

N. P. Willis.

THE Spring is here—the delicate-footed May
 With its slight fingers full of leaves and flowers;
 And with it comes a thirst to be away,
 Wasting in wood-paths its voluptuous hours—
 A feeling that is like a sense of wings,
 Restless to soar above these perishing things.

We pass out from the city's feverish hum,
 To find refreshment in the silent woods;
 And nature, that is beautiful and dumb,
 Like a cool sleep upon the pulses broods.
 Yet, even there, a restless thought will steal,
 To teach the indolent heart it still must feel.

Strange, that the audible stillness of the noon,
 The waters tripping with their silver feet,
 The turning to the light of leaves in June,
 And the light whisper as their edges meet—
 Strange—that they fill not, with their tranquil tone,
 The spirit, walking in their midst alone.

There's no contentment, in a world like this,
 Save in forgetting the immortal dream;
 We may not gaze upon the stars of bliss,
 That through the cloud-rifts radiantly stream;
 Bird-like, the prisoned soul will lift its eye
 And sing—till it is hooded from the sky.

THE LITTLE BEACH BIRD.

Richard H. Dana.

THOU little bird, thou dweller by the sea,
 Why takest thou its melancholy voice?
 Why with that boding cry
 O'er the waves dost thou fly?
 O, rather, bird, with me
 Through the fair land rejoice!

Thy flitting form comes ghostly dim and pale,
 As driven by a beating storm at sea;
 Thy cry is weak and scared,
 As if thy mates had shared
 The doom of us. Thy wail—
 What does it bring to me?

Thou call'st along the sand, and haunt'st the surge,
 Restless and sad; as if, in strange accord
 With motion, and with roar
 Of waves that drive to shore,
 One spirit did ye urge—
 The Mystery—the Word.

Of thousands thou, both sepulchre and pall,
 Old Ocean, art! A requiem o'er the dead,
 From out thy gloomy cells,
 A tale of mourning tells—
 Tells of man's wo and fall,
 His sinless glory fled.

Then turn thee, little bird, and take thy flight
 Where the complaining sea shall sadness bring Thy spirit never more.
 Come quit with me the shore,
 For gladness and the light,
 Where birds of summer sing.

TRANSLATIONS

FROM THE GREEK, LATIN, ITALIAN, GERMAN AND FRENCH, &c.

THE SUIT OF THETIS TO JUPITER IN FAVOR OF ACHILLES.

From the Greek of Homer.

Translated by W. Cowper.

THE swift Achilles, Peleus' noble son
Beside his gallant bark or in his tent
Pined all the day, nor would in council seek Distinction, or appear in battle more,
Though his heart panted for the glorious field.
But when the twelfth fair morrow streak'd the East,
Then all the everlasting gods to heav'n
Resorted, with the Thund'rer at their head,
And Thetis, not unmindful of her son
From the salt flood emerging, sought betimes
Olympus and the boundless fields of heav'n.
High, on the topmost eminence sublime
Of the deep-fork'd Olympian she perceiv'd
The Thund'rer seated, from the gods apart.
She sat before him, to his knees applied
Her left hand, placed her right beneath his chin,
And thus the King, Saturnian Jove, implored.

Father of all, by all that I have done
Or said that ever pleased thee, grant my suit.
I ask some honour on the waning days
Of my unhappy son doom'd soon to die,
For he endures dishonour now, deprived
By Agamemnon of his just reward*.

But oh! consent not thou to his disgrace
Olympian Jove! but honour him, and grant
Troy's host to prosper, till Achaia's host
With tenfold honours heal his present harm.

She spake, to whom the Thund'rer nought replied,
But silent sat long time. She, as her hand
Had grown there, still importunate, his knees
Clasp'd as at first, and thus her suit renew'd.

Or grant my prayer, and ratify the grant,
Or send me hence (for thou hast none to fear)
Plainly refused; that I may know and feel
By how much I am least of all in heav'n.

To whom, o'erwhelm'd with sadness, at the last,
Thus Jove replied. Hard task and full of strife
Thou hast enjoined me; Juno will not spare
For gibe and taunt injurious, whose complaint
Sounds daily in the ears of all the gods,
That I assist the Trojans; but depart,
Lest she observe thee; my concern shall be
How best I may perform thy full desire.
And to assure thee more, I give the sign
Indubitable, which all fear expels
At once from heavenly minds. Nought, so confirmed,
May, after, be reversed or render'd vain.

He ceased, and under his dark brows the nod
Vouchsafed of confirmation. All around
The Sov'reign's everlasting head his curls
Ambrosial shook, and the huge mountain reeled†.

* King Agamemnon had deprived Achilles of his beautiful prize, the Captive Chryseis, daughter of the priest Chryses.

† When Phidias was asked after what original he would make his statue of Jupiter, he answered that he had found one in this passage of Homer.

Their conference closed, they went; she down at once

With headlong plunge into the briny deep,
And to his own ethereal mansion Jove.
His dread approach perceiv'd, uprose the gods,
And all at once, to meet the sire of all.
He reach'd his throne and sat.—Nor had he held
That conference with the daughter of the deep
By Juno unobserved, who all in haste
As touch'd with deep resentment, thus began.

Oh close and politic! what goddess shares
Thy counsels now? That favour free to all
Is still refused to me, unworthy deem'd,
Think what thou may'st, to know one thought of thine.

To whom the sire of gods and men replied.
Juno, despair to be inform'd of all
My plans and views; Jove's consort as thou art, Thou could'st not learn them. What thou can'st, thou shalt,

And none in heav'n or earth with less restraint.
But leave that hidden which I choose to hide,
Nor search nor ask what none in heav'n shall know.

Then thus, with eyes full-orb'd the spouse of Jove.

Dread son of Saturn! why these words to me?
Far less asperity might serve to chide
My first inquiry; for I ever left,
Till now, thy secret counsel to its course.
But fear now prompts me—thou hast been beguil-

ed
By Thetis, daughter of the hoary deep,
Who was an early suitor as thy knees.
Ah! Thou hast giv'n her the assuring sign
And Grecians are to perish at the ships
By thousands, for the glory of her son.

To whom, incensed, the sov'reign lord of air.

Ah subtle! Ever teeming with surmise,
And fathomer of my concealed designs,
Thy toil is vain, or (which is worse for thee)
Shall but estrange thee from mine heart the more.
And be it as thou sayest—I am well pleased
That so it should be. Be advised, desist,
Hold thou thy peace. Else, if these dreadful hands
Approach thee once to seize thee, not the force
Of all the gods shall give a check to me.

He said.—whom Juno, awful goddess, heard
Appall'd, and mute submitted to his will.
But through the courts of Jove the heav'nly pow'rs
All felt displeasure; when to them arose
Vulcan, illustrious artist, who with speech
Conciliatory interposed to sooth
His beauteous mother Juno, and began—

What end can be expected but the worst
Of this loud brawling for the sake of man,
This din among the gods? Farewell the feast
With all its joys, if spleen must thus prevail.
But let me warn, already not unwar'd,
My mother to assume her sweetest smiles

To sooth my father, lest he chide again,
And the whole banquet suffer in the storm. *
For, if he pleased, the Thund'rer could unthrone
All here, and, in a moment, dash us down
From heav'n to earth—So sov'reign is his pow'r.
Then seek to sooth him, for his kindness, once
Secured to thee, will soon be felt by all.

He ended, and, upstarting, placed a cup
Full-charged between his mother's hands, and said.

Be meek, be patient, rule thy troubled heart ;
Lest, though I love thee and would gladly aid,
I see thy punishment, and want the pow'r.
Who can resist the Thund'rer ? Me, when once
I flew to save thee, by the foot he seiz'd
And hurl'd me through the portal of the skies*.
" From morn to eve I fell," and dropp'd, at last,
Half-dead in Lemnos, where with timely speed
The native Sintians flock'd to my relief†.

So He ; then Juno, beauteous goddess, smiled,
And smiling still, from his unwonted hand
Received the goblet. He from right to left
Rich nectar from the beaker drawn, alert
Distributed to all the pow'r's divine.
Heav'n rang with laughter not to be suppress'd
At sight of Vulcan in his new employ‡.

So spent they in festivity the day,
And all were cheered ; nor was Apollo's harp
Silent, nor did the Muses spare to add
Responsive melody of vocal sweets.
But when the sun's bright orb had now declined,
Each to his mansion, wheresoever built
By the lame matchless Architect, withdrew.
Jove also, kindler of the lightnings, climb'd
The couch whereon his custom was to rest
When gentle sleep approach'd him, and reposed
With his imperial consort at his side.

[Iliad, Book I.

THE PARTING OF HECTOR AND ANDROMACHE.

From the same, and by the same translator.

HE ceas'd, retired, and in a moment pass'd
To his own mansion ; but he found not there
His beauteous spouse, then standing on the tow'r
With her attendant nurse and infant boy,
All sighs and tears. He, missing whom he sought,
His soul's delight, turn'd thence ; but ere he left
The portal, of her women thus inquir'd.

Speak, damsels of her train ! and well beware
That ye speak truly ! Whither went from home
My chaste Andromache ? To breathe her vows
In Pallas' temple ? or to weep retired
With some fair sister of the Royal house ?

* Hercules having laid Troy in ruins, was, on his return, driven to Cos by a storm of Juno's raising who hated him, and who had contrived to cast Jupiter into a profound sleep that he might not interrupt her purpose. Jupiter awaking, in resentment of her artifice practised on him, punished her with bonds, which Vulcan attempting to loose was discovered by Jupiter and cast headlong down to Lemnos.—Vide Schol. Per Bernes.

† So called from Xipho to hurt, because they are said to have been inventors of martial weapons.—Vide Schol. per Vill.

‡ The reader, in order that he may partake with the gods in the drollery of this scene, should observe that the crippled and distorted Vulcan had thrust himself into an office at all other times administered either by Hebe or Ganymede.

To whom the chief in office o'er them all.
Since, Hector ! with such strenuous command
Thou hast enjoined me truth—She neither sought
Minerva's temple, nor to weep retired
With any sister of the Royal house,
But taught by rumour that the Trojan arms
Opposed in vain the Grecian, wild with woe
She bade the nurse bear after her, her charge
Thy darling boy, and flew to mount the tow'r.

She said : forth rush'd the hero to retrace
His former steps, and the huge city soon
Left all behind him, to the Scæan gate
Now came, his destin'd pass into the field.
There, pale and panting (for she ran) he met
Andromache. In Hypoplacian Thebes
Her wealthy sire the brave Eëtion dwelt,
E'tion, ruler of Cilicia's realm
In Hypoplacian Thebes the forest-crown'd.
His daughter was the valiant Hector's wife.
Thus wing'd with haste she came, and with like haste
The virgin-nurse, enfolding in her arms
His yet unwean'd and helpless Little-one,
Fair as the star of morn. Him Hector named
Scamandrius ; but the citizens of Troy
Astyanax* ; for other guardian aid
Effectual, none, than Hector's, Ilium knew.
Mute, but with smiles paternal, on his child
The father gazed, whose hand his lovely spouse
Seiz'd fast, the while, and, weeping, thus began.

Ah ! doom'd, thyself, the victim of thy own
Too daring courage ! Pity of thy boy
Thou feel'st not, or of me, thy widow soon,
For soon the whole united Grecian host
Will overwhelm thee, and thou must be slain
Earth yield me, then, a tomb ! for refuge else
Or none so safe have I, thenceforth forlorn
Of all defence, since father I have none,
Or mother's genial home to shelter me.
Achilles, when he sack'd Cilician Thebes
And fired her lofty domes, my father slew ;
He slew Eëtion—but, a decent awe
Forbidding him to bare a royal corse,
He burn'd him with his arms, heap'd high the soil
That hides his urn, and the Oreades†,
Jove's daughters, circled it around with elms.
My seven brothers, feeding in the field
Their flocks and herds, all perish'd in a day,
For dread Achilles found and slew them all.
My mother, whom in all her green retreats
Hypoplacus obey'd, when, rich in spoils,
The conqueror steer'd his gallant barks to Troy
Came captive in the fleet, but ransom'd hence
At countless cost, revisited her home,
And, by Diana pierced, at home expired‡.
All these are lost ; but in thy wedded love,
My faithful Hector ! I regain them all
Come then—let pity plead ! to spare thy boy
An orphan's woes, and widowhood to me,
Defend this tow'r ; and where the fig-tree spreads
Her branches, station thy collected force,
For there Idomeneus, the King of Crete,

* The name signifies, the Chief of the City.

† Mountain-nymphs.

‡ Sudden deaths were ascribed either to Diana or Apollo.

Tydidēs, either Ajax, and the sons
Of Atreus, thrice with their united pow'rs
Have press'd to seize the city ; whether taught
By some interpreter of signs from heaven,
Or prompted by remark and self-advised.

To whom majestic Hector thus replied.
Thy cares are all mine also. But I dread,
The matron's scorn, the brave man's just disdain,
Should fear seduce me to desert the field.
No, my Andromache ! my fearless heart
Me rather urges into foremost fight
Studious of Priam's glory and my own.
For my prophetic soul foresees a day
When Ilium : Ilium's people ; and, himself,
Her warlike King shall perish. But no grief
For Ilium ; for her people ; for the King
My warlike Sire ; nor even for the Queen ;
Nor for the num'rous and the valiant band
My brothers, destined, all, to bite the ground,
So moves me, as my grief for Thee alone,
Doom'd, then, to follow some impetuous Greek,
A weeping captive, to the distant shores
Of Argos ; there to labour at the loom
For a task-mistress, and with many a sigh,
But heav'd in vain, to bear the pond'rous urn
From Hyperia's or Messeis' fount.
Fast flow thy tears, the while, and as he eyes
That silent show'r, some passing Greek shall say—
" This was the wife of Hector, who excelled
" All Troy in fight when Ilium was besieged."
While thus he speaks, thy tears shall flow afresh,
The guardian of thy freedom while he lived
For ever lost ; but be my bones inhumed,
A senseless store, or e'er thy parting cries
Shall pierce mine ear, and Thou be dragg'd away.

The Hero ended, and his hands put forth
To reach his boy ; but with a scream the child
Stall closer to his nurse's bosom clung
Shunning his touch ; for dreadful in his eyes
The braz'n armour shone, and dreadful more
The shaggy crest that swept his father's brow.
Both parents smiled delighted ; and the Chief
Set down the crested terror on the ground,
Then kiss'd him, play'd away his infant fears,
And thus to Jove and all the Pow'rs above.
Grant, oh ye gods ! such eminent renown
And might in arms, as ye have giv'n to me,
To this my son, with strength to govern Troy.
From fight return'd, be this his welcome home—
" He far excels his sire"—and may he rear
The crimson trophy, to his mother's joy !

He spake, and to his lovely spouse consign'd
The darling boy ; with mingled smiles and tears
She wrapp'd him in her bosom's fragrant folds,
And Hector, pang'd with pity that she wept,
Her dewy cheek stroak'd softly, and began.

Weep not for me, my Love ! no mortal arm
Shall send me prematurely to the shades,
Since, whether brave or dastard, at his birth
The Fates ordain to each his hour to die.
Hence, then, to our abode ; there weave or spin,
And task thy maidens. War to men belongs ;
To all of Troy ; and most of all to me*.

* The suitable difference of the manners ascribed by the poet to Hector and to Paris is here observable. Hector is ever

So saying, the Hero to his brows restored
The tufted helmet, and his lovely spouse,
(Oft turning as she went, and show'ring tears
Of tend'rest sorrow) left him as he bade.
Arriving where, the terrible in arms,
Her Hector dwelt, with such afflictive moans
She pierc'd their hearts, that all her num'rous train
Mourn'd also ; mourning Hector still alive,
In his own palace, as already slain,
For all hope fail'd them of his safe return.

[Iliad, Book VI.]

HECTOR WOUNDED BY AJAX.

From the same, and by the same translator.

Not so the billows roar
The shores among, when Boreas' roughest blast
Sweeps landward from the main the swelling surge.
Not so, devouring fire among the trees
That clothe the mountain, when the sheeted flames
Ascending wrap the forest in a blaze ;
Nor howl the winds through leafy boughs of oaks
Uprgrown aloft (though loudest there they rave)
With sounds so awful as were heard of Greeks
And Trojans shouting when the clash began.

At Ajax first (for Ajax with his face Turn'd right toward him stood) brave Hector threw,
But smote him where the belts that bore his shield
And faulchion cross'd each other on his breast.
The double guard preserv'd him unannoy'd.
Indignant that his spear had bootless flown,
Yet fearing death at hand, the Trojan Chief
Toward the phalanx of his friends retired.
But, as he went, huge Ajax with a stone
Of those which propp'd the ships (for num'rous
such

Lay rolling at the feet of those who fought)
Assail'd him. Twirling like a top it pass'd
The shield of Hector, near the neck his breast
Struck full, then plow'd circuitous the dust,
As when Jove's arm omnipotent an oak
Prostrates uprooted on the plain, a fume
Rises sulphureous from the riven trunk,
And if, perchance, some trav'ller nigh at hand
See it, he trembles at the bolt of Jove,
So fell the might of Hector, to the earth
Smitten at once. Down dropp'd his idle spear,
And with his helmet and his shield himself
Also ; loud thunder'd all his gorgeous arms.
Swift flew the Grecians, shouting to the skies
And show'ring darts, to drag his body thence,
But neither spear of theirs nor shaft could harm
The fallen leader, with such instant aid
His princely friends encircled him around,
Sarpedon, valiant Glaucus, Lycian Chiefs,
Polydamas, Æneas, and renown'd
Agenor ; nor were others more remiss,
But with round shields all shelter'd Hector fall'n,
Him soon uplifted from the plain his friends
From battle bore, till, where his charioteer
Behind the tumult of the fight detain'd
His splendid chariot and swift steeds, he came, mindful even in his tenderest moments, of his duty as a soldier, while Paris, on the contrary, lingered, till Helen herself was obliged to urge him.

Which drew him groaning back toward the town,
 Arriving at the fords of Xanthus' stream
 Vortiginous, from mighty Jove derived,
 They stretch'd him on the bank, and on his face
 Poured water; he, reviving, upward gazed,
 And seated on his hams black blood disgorged
 Coagulate, but soon relapsing, fell
 Supine, his eyes with pitchy darkness veil'd,
 And all his pow'rs still torpid by the blow.

[Iliad, Book XIV.

ACHILLES ARMING FOR BATTLE.

From the same, and by the same translator.

AND now the Grecians from their gallant fleet
 All pour'd themselves abroad. As when the snow,
 Descending thick from Jove is driv'n by gusts
 Of the clear-blowing North, so smiled the field
 With dazzling casques, boss'd bucklers, hauberks strong,
 And polished weapons issuing from the fleet*.
 Upwent the flash to heav'n; wide all around
 The campaign laugh'd with beamy brass illumed,
 And trappings of the warriors on all sides
 Resounded, amid'st whom Achilles arm'd.
 He gnashed his teeth, fire glimmer'd in his eyes,
 Anguish intolerable wrung his heart
 And fury against Troy, while he put on
 His glorious arms, the labour of a god.
 First, to his legs his polish'd greaves he clasp'd
 Studded with silver, then, his corslet bright
 Braced to his bosom, his huge sword of brass
 Athwart his shoulder slung, and his broad shield
 Uplifted last, luminous as the moon.
 Such as to mariners a fire appears,
 Kindled by shepherds on the distant top
 Of some lone hill; they, driv'n by stormy winds,
 Reluctant roam far off the fishy deep,
 Such from Achilles' burning shield divine
 A lustre struck the skies; his pound'rous helm
 He lifted to his brows; starlike it shone,
 And shook its curling crest of bushy gold,
 Consummate work of Vulcan's glorious art.
 So clad, the godlike hero trial made
 If his arms fitted him, and gave free scope
 To his proportion'd limbs; they buoyant proved
 As wings, and high upbore his airy tread.
 Forth from its case he drew his father's spear,
 Heavy and huge and long. That spear, of all
 Achaia's sons, none else had pow'r to wield:
 Achilles only could the Pelian beam
 Brandish, by Chiron for his father hewn
 From Pelion's top for slaughter of the brave.

[Iliad, Book XIX.

* Homer says—Θόρηκός τε κραταίργαλος—And Pausanias explaining the expression informs us, that the corslet or breastplate had sometimes a piece of armour connected with it by studs, which served as a covering for the back. Thus armed they deemed themselves sufficiently guarded even without the security of a shield. Phorcys is mentioned as an instance of a warrior thus accoutred, whom Ajax pierces immediately through his mail. See Book xvii.

MERCURY BEARING TO CALYPSO A MESSAGE FROM JUPITER—PARTING OF ULYSSES AND CALYPSO.

From the same, and by the same translator.

HE ended, nor the Argicæ refused,
 Messenger of the skies; his sandals fair,
 Ambrosial, golden, to his feet he bound,
 Which o'er the moist wave, rapid as the wind,
 Bear him, and o'er th' illimitable earth,
 Then took his rod with which, at will, all eyes
 He softly shuts, or opens them again.
 So arm'd, forth flew the valiant Argicæ.
 Alighting on Pieria, down he stoop'd
 To Ocean, and the billows lightly skimm'd
 In form a sea-mew, such as in the bays
 Tremendous of the barren deep her food
 Seeking, dips oft in brine her ample wing.
 In such disguise o'er many a wave he rode,
 But reaching, now, that isle remote, forsook
 The azure deep, and at the spacious grot,
 Where dwelt the amber-tressed nymph, arrived,
 Found her within. A fire on all the hearth
 Blazed sprightly, and, afar-diffused, the scent
 Of smooth-split cedar and of cypress-wood
 Odorous, burning, cheer'd the happy isle.
 She, busied at the loom, and plying fast
 Her golden shuttle, with melodious voice
 Sat chaunting there; a grove on either side,
 Alder and poplar, and the redolent branch
 Of cypress hemm'd the dark retreat around.
 There many a bird of broadest pinion built
 Secure her nest, the owl, the kite, and daw
 Long-tongued, frequenter of the sandy shores.
 A garden-vine luxuriant on all sides
 Mantled the spacious cavern, cluster-hung
 Profuse; four fountains of serenest lymph
 Their sinuous course pursuing side by side,
 Stray'd all around, and ev'ry where appear'd
 Meadows of softest verdure, purpled o'er
 With violets: it was a scene to fill
 A god from heav'n with wonder and delight.
 Hermes, Heav'n's messenger, admiring stood
 That sight, and having all survey'd, at length
 Enter'd the grotto; nor the lovely nymph
 Him knew not soon as seen, for not unknown
 Each to the other the Immortals are,
 How far soever sep'rate their abodes.
 Yet found he not within the mighty chief
 Ulysses; he sat weeping on the shore,
 Forlorn; for there his custom was with groans
 Of sad regret t' afflict his breaking heart,
 Looking continual o'er the barren deep*.
 Then thus Calypso, loveliest nymph divine,
 Of Hermes, from her dazzling throne, inquired.
 Hermes, swift bearer of the golden rod!
 Whom I respect and love, thou art a guest
 Unfrequent here—say, wherefore hast thou come?
 Speak thy desire; I grant it, if thou ask
 Things possible, and possible to me.

* The poet is supposed to sequester Ulysses on this occasion, that ignorant of the constraint under which Calypso acted, he might imagine her consent to his departure and the means with which she furnished him, to construct his raft, the effects of kindness merely, and hold himself everlastingly indebted to her.

Stay not, but entering farther, at my board
Due rites of hospitality receive.

So saying, the goddess with ambrosial food
Her table cover'd, and with rosy juice
Nectareous charged the cup. Then ate and drank
The Argicide and herald of the skies,
And when, divinely banquetted, he felt
His heart refresh'd, his message thus declared.

Questionest thou, a goddess, me a god !
I tell thee truth, since such is thy command.
Not willing, but by Jove constrain'd, I come.
For who would, voluntary, such a breadth
Enormous measure of the salt expanse,
Where city none is seen in which the gods
Are serv'd with chosen hecatombs and pray'r ?
But no divinity may the designs
Elude, or contravert, of Jove supreme.
He saith, that here thou hold'st the most distrest
Of all those warriors who nine years assa'd
The city of Priam, and, (that city sack'd)
Departed in the tenth ; but, going thence,
Offended Pallas, who with adverse winds
Opposed their voyage, and with boisterous waves.
Then perish'd all his gallant friends, but him
Billows and storms drove hither ; Jove commands
That thou dismiss him hence without delay,
For fate ordains him not to perish here
From all his friends remote, but he is doom'd
To see them yet again, and to arrive
At his own palace in his native land.

He said ; divine Calypso at the sound
Shudder'd, and in wing'd accents thus replied.

Ye are my st, ye gods, and envious past
All others, grudging if a goddess choose
A mortal husband, and avow the choice.
So, when the rosy-palm'd Aurora chose
Orion, even in your blest abodes
Ye rested not, till, in Ortygia, pierced
By fair Diana's gentle shafts he died.
So when the beauteous Ceres, in a deep
Three-labour'd fallow, sway'd by soft desire,
Infolded young Iasion in her arms,
Not long remain'd Jove ignorant, who smote
With his bright bolt and slew the favour'd swain*.
So also, O ye gods, ye envy me
The mortal man, my consort. Him I saved
Myself, while solitary on his keel
He rode, for with his sulph'rous arrow Jove
Had cleft his bark amid the sable deep.
Then perish'd all his gallant friends, but him
Billows and storms drove hither, whom I lov'd
Sincere, and fondly destin'd to a life
Immortal, unobnoxious to decay.
But since no Deity may the designs
Elude or contravert of Jove supreme,
Hence with him to a death abhor'd, if such
The sov'reign's will and such his stern command.
But undimiss'd he goes by me, who ships

* He was the son of Jupiter and Electra the daughter of Atlas, and by his amour with Ceres became the father of Plutus. This amour, however, was probably an allegorical one, as the Scholiast observes, and the truth of his history amounted to no more than that he was a person skilful in agriculture, and profiting much by his art, grew rich in consequence.

Myself well-oar'd and mariners have none
To send with him athwart the spacious flood ;
Yet will I counsel him, nor shall he want
Such means of furth'rance to his native isle
As my best help can furnish for his use.

Then Hermes thus, the messenger of heav'n.
So send him hence, and quickly, through respect
For the command of Jove ; whose fiery wrath,
If thou delay, thou may'st, thyself, incur.

So saying, the dauntless Argicide withdrew,
And she (Jove's mandate heard) all-graceful went,
Seeking the brave Ulysses ; on the shore
She found him seated ; tears that never ceas'd
His cheek bedew'd, and, since the lovely nymph
Had lost her pow'r to charm him, he resign'd
All thought of bliss besides, and in the pangs
Of hopeless exile pass'd his happiest hours.
Yet, through constraint, and listless to return
Her fond embraces, in her arch'd recess
He slept the night beside her, and, by day,
Reclining on the rocks that lined the shore,
And viewing wistfully the barren deep,
Wept, groan'd, desponded, sigh'd, and wept again.
Then, drawing near, thus spake the nymph divine.

Unhappy ! weep not here, nor life consume
In anguish ; go ; thou hast my glad consent.
Arise, and hewing from the trunks of trees
Long planks, with bolts of iron form a raft
Of needful breadth, which closely floor'd above,
Shall hence convey thee o'er the gloomy deep.
Bread, water, and the red grape's cheery juice
Myself will put on board, which shall preserve
Thy life from famine ; I will also give
New raiment for thy limbs, and will dispatch
Winds after thee to waft thee home unharmed,
If such the pleasure of the Gods who dwell
In yonder boundless heav'n, to whom belongs
Unerring skill to judge, and not to me.

She spake : Ulysses shudder'd at the sound,
And thus th' afflicted Hero, quick replied.

Ah ! other thoughts than of my safe return
Employ thee, Goddess, now, who bid'st me pass
The perilous gulph of Ocean on a raft,
That wild expanse, which even gallant ships
Pass not, though form'd to cleave their way with ease,

And joyful in propitious winds from Jove*.
No—let me never, in despite of thee,
Embark on board a raft, nor till thou swear,
Oh Goddess ! the inviolable oath,
That future mischief thou intend'st me none.

He said ; Calypso, beauteous Goddess, stroak'd
His wan, wet cheek, and, smiling, thus replied.

Thou dost asperse me rudely, and excuse
Of ignorance hast none, far better taught ;
What words were these ? How could'st thou thus reply ?

Now hear me Earth, and the wide Heav'n above !
Hear, too, ye waters of the Stygian stream
Under the earth, (by which the blessed gods Swear trembling, and revere the awful oath !)

* Ἀγαλλόμεναι. Homer, as Aristotle has observed, frequently ascribes life to inanimate things, and endues them with a metaphorical sensibility.

That future mischief I intend thee none*.
No, my designs concerning thee are such
As, in an exigence resembling thine,
Myself, most sure, should for myself conceive.
I have a mind more equal, not of steel
My heart is form'd, but much to pity inclined.

So saying, the lovely goddess with swift pace
Led on, whose footsteps he as swift pursued.
Within the vaulted cavern they arrived,
The goddess and the man; on the same throne
Ulysses sat, whence Hermes had aris'n,
Where all refreshments, such as mortals use,
Calypso placed before him, drink and meats
Of various kinds, then, opposite reposed,
Was served, herself, by her attendant train
With nectar and ambrosia. They their hands
Stretch'd forth together to the ready feast,
And when nor hunger more nor thirst remain'd
Unsated, thus the beauteous nymph began.

Laertes' godlike son, for wiles renown'd!
Can'st thou resolve thus suddenly to seek
Thy native shores?—I wish thee, not the less,
All joy—but knew'st thou to what num'rous woes
Thy fate ordains thee, in thy voyage hence,
Thy calm retirement and immortal life
Enjoy'd with me, would win thee to remain,
Ardent and ceaseless, as thy wishes are
To see Penelope; for, whether face
Or form engage thee, well may I presume
Mine scarce inferior, since immortal charms,
Compared with mortal merely, must excel.

To whom Ulysses, ever-wise, replied.
Dread goddess! bear with me. Myself, I know
That my Penelope, alike, in form
And stature altogether yields to thee,
For she is mortal, and immortal thou,
From age exempt; yet not the less I wish
My native home, and languish till the day
That sees my safe arrival, shall arise.
But should some god amid the sable deep
Dash me again into a wreck, my soul
Shall never, ev'n for such a cause, renounce
Her wonted fortitude; for I have borne
In storms and battle much; now, therefore, come
This evil also, following all the rest!

PHEMIUS THE BARD SPARED BY ULYSSES IN THE GENERAL SLAUGHTER OF THE SUITORS OF PENELOPE.

From the same, and by the same translator.

BUT Phemius, son of Terpius, bard divine,
Who, through compulsion, with his song regaled
The suitors, a like dreadful death escaped.
Fast by the postern, harp in hand, he stood,
Doubtful if, issuing, he should take his seat
Beside the altar of Hercæan Jove†,
Where oft Ulysses offer'd, and his sire,

* The water of Styx, according to Pausanias, dipped from a fountain near to Nonacris a town of Arcadia, and fell into the hollow of a lofty rock through which it passed into the river Cratis. He adds that it was fatal to every animal that drank it.

† So called because he was worshipped within the ἑκός or wall that surrounded the court.

Fat thighs of beeves, or whether he should haste,
T'embrace his knees, a suppliant for his life.
That course, at length, most pleased him; then, between

The beaker and an argent-studded throne
He grounded his sweet lyre, and seizing fast
The Hero's knees, him suppliant, thus address'd.

I clasp thy knees, Ulysses! oh respect
My suit, and spare me. Thou shalt not escape
Regret thyself hereafter, if thou slay
Me, charmer of the woes of gods and men.
Self-taught am I, and treasure in my mind
Songs of all argument from heav'n inspired,
And thou hast heard me chaunting to the lyre
Thy glorious deeds, as I had praised a god.
Spare, then, this, this ancient head; since not by choice
(As thy dear son will tell thee), nor to share
The banquet, have I served as minstrel here,
But awed by numbers, and by force constrain'd.

So he; whom hearing as he stood beside
His sire, Telemachus thus interposed.

Hold—Harm not with the vengeful faulchion's edge
This blameless man; and we will also spare
Medon the herald, who hath ever been
A watchful guardian of my boyish years,
Unless Philætiüs or Eumæus him
Have mingled with the rest, or thou, perchance,
Unconscious in the tumult of the fight.

He spake, whom Medon hearing (for he lay
Beneath a throne, and in a new-stript hide
Enfolded, trembling with the dread of death)
Sprang from his covert, cast away the skin,
And, flying to Telemachus, whose knees
He close embrac'd, thus, eager, sued to live.

Prince! I am here—oh, pity me! repress
Thine own, and pacify thy father's wrath,
That he destroy not me through fierce revenge
Of their iniquities who have consumed
His wealth, and, in their folly, scorn'd his son.

To whom Ulysses, ever-wise, replied,
Smiling complacent. Fear thou not; my son
Hath pleaded for thee. Therefore (taught thyself
That truth) teach others the superior worth
Of honest with dishonest deeds compared.
But go ye forth, thou and the sacred bard,
That ye may sit withdrawn in yonder court
From all this carnage, while I give command,
Myself, concerning it to those within.

MOONLIGHT SCENE.

From the Greek of Homer.

Translated by Alexander Pope.

THE troops exulting sat in order round,
And beaming fires illumin'd all the ground.
As when the moon, refulgent lamp of night!
O'er heaven's clear azure spreads her sacred light,
When not a breath disturbs the deep serene,
And not a cloud o'ercasts the solemn scene;
Around her throne the vivid planets roll,
And stars unnumber'd gild the glowing pole;
O'er the dark trees a yellower verdure shed,
And tip with silver every mountain's head

Then shine the vales, the rocks in prospect rise,
 A flood of glory bursts from all the skies :
 The conscious swains, rejoicing in the sight,
 Eye the blue vault, and bless the useful light.
 So many flames before proud Ilion blaze,
 And lighten glimmering Xanthus with their rays :
 The long reflections of the distant fires
 Gleam on the walls, and tremble on the spires.
 A thousand piles the dusky horrors gild,
 And shoot a shady lustre o'er the field.
 Full fifty guards each flaming pile attend,
 Whose umber'd arms, by fits, thick flashes send,
 Loud neigh the coursers o'er the heaps of corn,
 And ardent warriors wait the rising morn*.

[Pope's Iliad, Book VIII.]

* I give the following different translations of this very celebrated passage because it is one that has called forth a great variety of critical opinions regarding the merits of Homer's translators. Wordsworth, Coleridge, Leigh Hunt and others have condemned Pope's translation as not only unfaithful as a translation, but ludicrously inaccurate and inconsistent as a description of a moonlight scene; while Melmoth and Byron have asserted that Pope in this instance has not only shown himself a true painter of nature but has greatly excelled the original. Of the correctness or inaccuracy of this assertion the mere English reader may form some idea by comparing Pope's version with the almost literal translation of Cowper. A good opportunity is offered to a teacher of taste and discrimination to point out to young students the comparative excellences or imperfections of the different versions here brought together.

The first fourteen lines of Pope include the description of the moonlight scene, but I have inserted the succeeding ten in justice to the translator, for whatever may be said or thought of the first part, the second is undoubtedly without reference to the original highly spirited, harmonious and poetical.

In the preceding pages I have given a greater number of extracts from Cowper's translation of Homer, than from Pope's, for two reasons:—because Cowper's is generally allowed to be far more faithful to the original (though less musical and ornate), and because Pope's translation is already in almost every hand and is easily and cheaply procurable in the native bazaars of Calcutta, while a copy of Cowper's is rarely obtainable even in the European shops here.—Cowper.

And spent all night in open field; fires about them shined,
 As when about the silver moon, when air is free from wind,
 And stars shine clear, to whose sweet beams high prospects
 And the brows
 Of all steep hills and pinnacles thrust up themselves for showes;
 And even the lowly vallies joy, to glitter in their sight,
 When the unmeasured firmament bursts to disclose her light,
 And all the shines in heaven are seen, that glad the shepherd's
 heart;
 So many fires disclose their beames, made by the Trojan part,
 Before the face of Ilion; and her bright turrets showed.
 A thousand courts of guard kept fires; and every guard allowed
 Fifty stout men, by whom their horse eate oates and hard white corne;
 And all did wiffully expect the silver-throned morne.

[Chapman's Homer.]

Bro with great purposes and proud, they sat,
 Not disarray'd, but in fair form disposed
 Of even ranks, and watched their num'rous fires.
 As when around the clear bright moon, the stars
 Shine in full splendour, and the winds are hush'd,
 The groves, the mountain tops, the headland heights
 Stand all apparent, not a vapour streaks
 The boundless blue, but ether open'd wide
 All glitters, and the shepherd's heart is cheer'd:
 So num'rous seem'd those fires between the stream
 Of Xanthus, blazing, and the fleet of Greece,
 In prospect all of Troy; a thousand fires,
 Each watch'd by fifty warriors seated near.
 The steeds beside the chariots stood, their corn
 Chewing, and waiting till the golden-thron'd
 Aurora should restore the light of day.

[Cowper's Homer.]

NEPTUNE PROCEEDING TO ASSIST THE GREEKS.

From the same, and by the same translator.

WHEN now the Thunderer* on the sea-beat coast,
 Had fix'd great Hector and his conquering host;
 He left them to the fates, in bloody fray,
 To toil and struggle through the well-fought day.
 Then turn'd to Thracia from the field of fight
 Those eyes that shed insufferable light,
 To where the Mysians prove their martial force,
 And hardy Thracians tame the savage horse;
 And where the far-fam'd Hippemolgian strays,
 Renown'd for justice and for length of days;
 Thrice happy race! that, innocent of blood,
 From milk, innoxious, seek their simple food:
 Jove sees delighted; and avoids the scene
 Of guilty Troy, of arms, and dying men:
 No aid, he deems, to either host is given,
 While his high law suspends the powers of heaven.

Meantime the monarch of the wat'ry main†
 Observ'd the Thunderer, nor observed in vain,
 In Samothracia, on a mountain's brow,
 Whose waving woods o'erhung the deeps below,
 He sat and round him cast his azure eyes,
 Where Ida's misty tops confus'dly rise;
 Below, fair Ilion's glittering spires were seen;
 The crowded ships, and sable seas between
 There, from the crystal chambers of the main
 Emerg'd, he sat, and mourn'd his Argives slain.
 At Jove incens'd, with grief and fury stung,
 Prone down the rocky steep he rush'd along;
 Fierce as he pass'd, the lofty mountains nod,
 The forest shakes; earth trembled as he trod,
 And felt the footsteps of th' immortal god.
 From realm to realm three ample strides he took,
 And at the fourth, the distant Ægæ shook.

They, musing mighty deeds,
 With ranks unbroken as in combat, sat,
 Through the long night, while many a fire blazed round.
 As beautiful the stars shine out in heaven
 Around the splendid moon, no breath of wind
 Ruffling the blue calm ether; clear'd from mist
 The beacon hill-tops, crags, and forest dells
 Emerge in light; the immeasurable sky
 Breaks from above, and opens on the gaze;
 The multitude of stars are seen at once
 Full sparkling, and the shepherd looking up
 Feels gladden'd at his heart; so many fires,
 Midway the ships and Xanthus' glimmering stream,
 Blazed up in front of Troy. A thousand flames
 Burn'd on the plain: around each separate pile
 Sat fifty men, on whom the reddening glare
 Reflected shone. Meanwhile the steeds all stood
 Fast by their chariots, champing the white grain;
 And farried till the bright-throned morn appear.

[Eden's Specimens of the Classic Poets.]

BUT Troy elate, in orderly array
 All night around her numerous watchfires lay,—
 As when in heaven the stars at night's still noon
 Beam in their brightness round the full orb'd moon,
 When sleeps the wind, and every mountain's height,
 Rocks, cliffs, and groves, shine towering up in light,
 And the vast firmament immensely niven,
 Expands for other stars another heaven,
 Gladdening the shepherd's heart; so numerous rose
 The watch-fires round the warriors armed repose,
 In sight of Troy, and wide illum'd the scene.
 The flow of Xanthus and the fleet between;
 A thousand fires; and each with separate blaze
 O'er fifty warriors cast the undying rays,
 Where, ranged beside the cars, full fed with corn,
 The steeds impatient stood, and snuffed the coming morn.

[Sotheby's Homer.]

* Jupiter.

† Neptune.

Far in the bay his shining palace stands,
 Eternal frame ! not rais'd by mortal hands ;
 This having reach'd, his brass-hoof'd steeds he reins
 Fleet as the winds, and deck'd with golden manes.
 Refulgent arms his mighty limbs infold,
 Immortal arms of adamant and gold.
 He mounts the car, the golden scourge applies,
 He sits superior, and the chariot flies :
 His whirling wheels the glassy surface sweep ;
 Th' enormous monsters rolling o'er the deep,
 Gambol around him on the wat'ry way ;
 And heavy whales in awkward measures play
 The sea subsiding spreads a level plain,
 Exults, and owns the monarch of the main :
 The parting waves before his coursers fly ;
 The wondering waters leave the axle dry.

[Pope's Iliad, Book XIII.]

MEETING OF ULYSSES AND HIS FATHER.

From the same, and by the same translator.

Now, from the town, Ulysses and his band
 Pass'd to Laertes' cultivated land.
 The ground himself had purchas'd with his pain,
 And labour made the rugged soil a plain.
 There stood his mansion of the rural sort,
 With useful buildings round the lowly court :
 Where the few servants that divide his care,
 Took their laborious rest, and homely fare ;
 And one Sicilian matron, old and sage,
 With constant duty tends his drooping age.
 Here now arriving, to his rustic band
 And martial son, Ulysses gave command :
 Enter the house, and of the bristly swine
 Select the largest to the powers divine.
 Alone, and unattended, let me try
 If yet I share the old man's memory :
 If those dim eyes can yet Ulysses know
 (Their light and dearest object long ago),
 Now chang'd with time, with absence, and with woe ?

Then to his train he gives his spear and shield ;
 The house they enter ; and he seeks the field,
 Through rows of shade, with various frutage crown'd,
 And labour'd scenes of richest verdure round.
 Nor aged Dolius, nor his sons were there,
 Nor servants, absent on another care ;
 To search the woods for sets of flowery thorn,
 Their orchard bounds to strengthen and adorn,

But all alone the hoary king he found ;
 His habit coarse, but warmly wrapt around ;
 His head, that bow'd with many a pensive care,
 Fenc'd with a double cap of goatskin hair :
 His buskins old, in former service torn,
 But well repair'd ; and gloves against the thorn.
 In this array the kingly gardener stood,
 And clear'd a plant, encumber'd with its wood.
 Beneath a neighbouring tree the chief divine
 Gaz'd o'er his sire, retracing every line,
 The ruins of himself ! now worn away
 With age, yet still majestic in decay !
 Sudden his eyes releas'd their watery store ;
 The much-enduring man could bear no more.
 Doubtful he stood, if instant to embrace

His aged limbs, to kiss his reverend face,
 With eager transport to disclose the whole,
 And pour at once the torrent of his soul.—
 Not so : his judgment takes the winding way
 Of question distant, and of soft essay :
 More gentle methods on weak age employs ;
 And moves the sorrows to enhance the joys.
 Then, to his sire with beating heart he moves ;
 And with a tender pleasantry reproves :
 Who digging round the plant still hangs his head,
 Nor aught remits the work, while thus he said :
 Great is thy skill, O father, great thy toil,
 Thy careful hand is stamp'd on all the soil,
 Thy squadron'd vineyards well thy art declare,
 The olive green, blue fig, and pendent pear ;
 And not one empty spot escapes thy care.
 On every plant and tree thy cares are shown,
 Nothing neglected, but thyself alone.
 Forgive me, father, if this fault I blame ;
 Age so advanc'd may some indulgence claim.
 Not for thy stoic, I deem thy lord unkind ;
 Nor speaks thy form a mean or servile mind :
 I read a monarch in that princely air,
 The same thy aspect, if the same thy care :
 Soft sleep, fair garments, and the joys of wine.
 These are the rights of age, and should be thine.
 Who then thy master, say ? and whose the land
 So dress'd and manag'd by thy skilful hand ?
 But chief, oh tell me ! (what I question most)
 Is this the far-fam'd Ithacensian coast ?
 For so reported the first man I view'd,
 (Some story islander, of manner rude)
 Nor further conference vouchsaf'd to stay ;
 Heedless he whistled, and pursued his way.
 But thou ! whom years have taught to understand,
 Humanely hear, and answer my demand :
 A friend I seek, a wise one and a brave,
 Say, lives he yet, or moulders in the grave ?
 Time was (my fortunes then were at the best)
 When at my house I lodg'd this foreign guest ;
 He said, from Ithaca's fair isle he came,
 And old Laertes was his father's name.
 To him whatever to a guest is ow'd
 I paid, and hospitable gifts bestow'd :
 To him seven talents of pure ore I told,
 Twelve cloaks, twelve vests, twelve tunics stuff with gold ;

A bowl, that rich with polish'd silver flames,
 And skill'd in female works, four lovely dames.

At this the father, with a father's fears,
 (His venerable eyes bedimm'd with tears,)
 This is the land ; but ah ! thy gifts are lost,
 For godless men, and rude, possess the coast :
 Sunk is the glory of this once-fam'd shore !
 Thy ancient friend, O stranger, is no more !
 Full recompence thy bounty else had borne ;
 For every good man yields a just return :
 So civil rights demand ; and who begins
 The track of friendship, not pursuing, sins.
 But tell me, stranger, be the truth confess'd
 What years have circled since thou saw'st that guest ?

That hapless guest, alas ! for ever gone !
 Wretch that he was ! and that I am ! my son !

If ever man to misery was born,
 'Twas his to suffer, and 'tis mine to mourn!
 Far from his friends, and from his native reign,
 He lies a prey to monsters of the main,
 Or savage beasts his mangled relics tear,
 Or screaming vultures scatter through the air:
 Nor could his mother funeral unguents shed;
 Nor wail'd his father o'er th' untimely dead:
 Nor his sad consort, on the mournful bier,
 Seal'd his cold eyes or dropp'd a tender tear!
 But tell me, who thou art! and what thy race?
 Thy town, thy parents, and thy native place?
 Or, if a merchant in pursuit of gain,
 What port receiv'd thy vessel from the main?
 Or com'st thou single, or attend thy train?

Then thus the son: From Alybas I came,
 My palace there; Eperitus my name.
 Not vulgar born; from Aphidas, the king
 Of Polypemon's royal line, I spring.
 Some adverse Dæmon from Sicania bore
 Our wandering course, and drove us on your shore:
 Far from the town, an unfrequented bay;
 Reliev'd our weary'd vessel from the sea.
 Five years have circled since these eyes pursued
 Ulysses parting through the sable flood;
 Prosperous he sail'd, with dexter auguries,
 And all the wing'd good omens of the skies.
 Well hop'd we, then, to meet on this fair shore,
 Whom Heaven, alas! decreed to meet no more.

Quick through the father's heart these accents ran:

Grief seiz'd at once, and wrapt up all the man;
 Deep from his soul he sigh'd, and sorrowing spread
 A cloud of ashes on his hoary head.
 Trampling with agonies of strong delight
 Stood the great son, heart-wounded with the sight;
 He ran, he seiz'd him with a strict embrace,
 With thousand kisses wander'd o'er his face:
 I, I am he; O father rise, behold
 Thy son, with twenty winters now grown old;
 Thy son, so long desir'd, so long detain'd,
 Restor'd, and breathing in his native land:
 These floods of sorrow, O my sire, restrain!
 The vengeance is complete; the suitor-train
 Stretch'd in our palace, by these hands lie slain.

Amaz'd, Laertes: "Give some certain sign,
 (If such thou art) to manifest thee mine."
 Lo here the wound (he cries) receiv'd of yore,
 The scar indented by the tusky boar,
 When by thyself and by Anticlea sent
 To old Autolychus's realms I went,
 Yet by another sign thy offspring know;
 The several trees you gave me long ago,
 While, yet a child, these fields I lov'd to trace,
 And trod thy footsteps with unequal pace;
 To every plant in order as we came,
 Well-pleas'd you told its nature, and its name,
 Whate'er my childish fancy ask'd, bestow'd;
 Twelve pear-trees bowing with their pendent load,
 And ten, that red with blushing apples glow'd;
 Full fifty purple figs; and many a row
 Of various vines that then began to blow,
 A future vintage! when the Hours produce
 Their latent buds, and Sol exalts the juice.

Smit with the signs, which all his doubts explain,
 His heart within him melts; his knees sustain
 Their feeble weight no more; his arms alone
 Support him, round the lov'd Ulysses thrown;
 He faints, he sinks, with mighty joys oppress'd:
 Ulysses clasps him to his eager breast.
 Soon as returning life regains its seat,
 And his breath lengthens, and his pulses beat;
 Yes, I believe (he cries) almighty Jove!
 Heaven rules us yet, and Gods there are above.
 'Tis so—the suitors for their wrongs have paid—
 But what shall guard us, if the town invade?
 If, while the news through every city flies,
 All Ithaca and Cephallenia rise?

To this Ulysses: As the Gods shall please
 Be all the rest; and set thy soul at ease.
 Haste to the cottage by this orchard side,
 And take the banquet which our cares provide:
 There wait thy faithful band of rural friends,
 And there the young Telemachus attends.

Thus having said, they trac'd the garden o'er,
 And stooping enter'd at a lowly door.
 The swains and young Telemachus they found,
 The victim portion'd and the goblet crown'd.
 The hoary king, his old Sicilian maid
 Perfum'd and wash'd, and gorgeously array'd.
 Pallas attending gives his frame to shine
 With awful port, and majesty divine;
 His gazing son admires the godlike grace,
 And air celestial dawning o'er his face;
 What God, he cry'd, my father's form improves?
 How high he treads, and how enlarg'd he moves!

CREATION OF PANDORA.

From the Greek of Hesiod*.

Translated by Charles A. Elton.

THE food of man in deep concealment lies,
 The angry gods have veil'd it from our eyes.
 Else had one day bestow'd sufficient cheer,
 And though inactive fed thee through the year.
 Then might thy hand have laid the rudder by,
 In blackning smoke for ever hung on high;
 Then had the labouring ox foregone the soil,
 And patient mules had found reprieve from toil.
 But Jove conceal'd our food, incensed at heart
 Since mock'd by wise Prometheus' wily art.
 Sore ills to man devised the Heavenly Sire,
 And hid the shining element of fire.
 Prometheus, then, benevolent of soul,
 In hollow reed the spark recovering stole,
 Cheering to man, and mock'd the god whose gaze
 Serene rejoices in the lightning's rays.
 "Oh son of Japhet! with indignant heart
 Spake the Cloud-gatherer; oh unmatch'd in art!
 Exultest thou in this the flame retriev'd,
 And dost thou triumph in the god deceiv'd?"

* The period of Hesiod's birth is involved in as much uncertainty as that of Homer. It is supposed by some writers that they were contemporary and that they lived about 900 years before Christ.

But thou, with the posterity of man,
Shalt rue the fraud whence mightier ills began :
I will send evil for thy stealthy fire,
An ill which all shall love, and all desire."

The Sire who rules the earth and sways the pole

Had said, and laughter fill'd his secret soul.
He bade the crippled god his hest obey,
And mould with tempering water plastic clay ;
Imbreathe the human voice within her breast,
With firm-strung nerves th' elastic limbs invest :
Her aspect fair as goddesses above,
A virgin's likeness with the brows of love.
He bade Minerva teach the skill that dies
The web with colours as the shuttle flies :
He call'd the magic of love's charming queen
To breathe around a witchery of mein :
Then plant the rankling stings of keen desire,
And cares that trick the limbs with prank'd attire :
Bade Hermes impart the craft refined
Of thievish manners and a shameless mind.

He gives command, th' inferior powers obey,
The crippled artist moulds the temper'd clay :
A maid's coy image rose at Jove's behest ;
Minerva clasp'd the zone, diffused the vest ;
Adored Persuasion and the Graces young
Her taper'd limbs with golden jewels hung ;
Round her smooth brow the beauteous-tressed Hours
A garland twined of Spring's purpurcal flowers ;
The whole attire Minerva's graceful art
Disposed, adjusted, form'd to every part ;
And last the winged herald of the skies,
Slayer of Argos, gave the gift of lies ;
Gave trickish manners, honey'd words instill'd,
As he that rolls the deep'ning thunder will'd :
Then by the feather'd messenger of Heaven,
The name Pandora to the maid was given :
For all the gods conferr'd a gifted grace
To crown this mischief of the mortal race.

The Sire commands the winged herald bear
The finish'd nymph, th' inextricable snare :
To Epimetheus was the present brought ;
Prometheus' warning vanish'd from his thought :
That he disclaim each offering from the skies,
And straight restore, lest ill to man arise.
But he received, and conscious knew too late
Th' insidious gift, and felt the curse of fate.

On earth of yore the sons of men abode
From evil free and labour's galling load ;
Free from diseases that with racking rage
Precipitate the pale decline of age.
Now swift the days of manhood haste away,
And misery's pressure tarns the temples gray.
The woman's hands an ample casket bear :
She lifts the lid—she scatters ills in air.
Hope sole remain'd within, nor took her flight,
Beneath the vessel's verge conceal'd from light :
Or ere she fled, the maid, advised by Jove,
Seal'd fast th' unbroken cell, and dropp'd the lid
above.

Issued the rest in quick dispersion hurl'd,
And woes innumerable roam'd the breathing world :
With ills the land is full, with ills the sea ;
Diseases haunt our frail humanity :

Self-wandering through the noon, the night, they glide,
Voiceless—a voice the power all-wise denied :
Know then this awful truth—it is not given
T' elude the wisdom of omniscient Heaven.

[Works and Days, Book I.

DANAË*.

From the Greek of Simonides†.

Translated by a Contributor to Blackwood's Magazine.

AROUND the helpless wandering bark
The gathering tempests howled,
And swelling o'er the ocean dark
The whitening billows rolled.

The fair one feared ; she turned her eyes,
Her eyes with anguish filled,
To where her sleeping infant lies,
She looked, and clasped the child.

"What griefs oppress this wearied breast !
Yet nought oppresses thine ;
No sorrows break thy placid rest :
Ah ! were these slumbers mine !

"Here e'en denied one scanty beam
The gloomy night to cheer,
Yet soft thou sleep'st, nor dost thou dream
Of tempest raging near.

"O lovely Babe ! around thy brow,
Unharm'd the curls play ;
Not all the angry blasts that blow
Can draw one sigh from thee.

"Yet did'st thou know how deep I moan,
Thou'dst bend thine infant ear,
Thy little heart would sighs return,
Thine eyes an answering tear.

"O sink, ye stormy winds, to rest !
Be still, thou troubled deep !
O sleep, ye sorrows in my breast,
And let me cease to weep !

"Sleep, sleep, my child, and may thine eyes
These sorrows never see !
On thee may brighter fortunes rise
Than ever shone on me !

"Almighty Jove ! to whom alone
The way of fate belongs,
O spare, O spare this little one
To wreak his mother's wrongs !"

* It may perhaps be right to remind some of our readers that Acrisius, King of the Argives, having learned from the Oracle that he should be killed by his grandson, shut up his daughter in a turret, who nevertheless became pregnant to Jupiter of the Golden Shower. When he understood that she had given birth to a son, he ordered them to be put into a chest or ark, and thrown into the sea. The chest was found by a fisherman, and given to Pilemnus, King of the Rutilians, who married Danaë. When Perseus, her son, grew up, he slew his grandfather, and thus the oracle was fulfilled.—Blackwood's Magazine.

THE SHORTNESS OF LIFE.

From the same.Translated by J. H. Merivale.

ALL human things are subject to decay ;
 And well the man of Chios tuned his lay,—
 "Like leaves on trees the race of man is found"—
 Yet few receive the melancholy sound,
 Or in their hearts imprint this solemn truth ;
 For hope is near to all, but most to youth.
 Hope's vernal season leads the laughing hours,
 And strews o'er every path the fairest flowers :
 To cloud the scene no distant mists appear ;
 Age moves no thought, and death awakes no fear.
 Ah ! how unmindful is the giddy crowd
 Of the small span to youth and life allow'd !
 Ye who reflect, the short-lived good employ,
 And while the power remains, indulge your joy.

HYMN TO HEALTH.

 From the Greek of Ariphron of SicyonTranslated by Robert Bland.*

HEALTH, brightest visitant from heaven,
 Grant me with thee to rest !
 For the short term by nature given,
 Be thou my constant guest !
 For all the pride that wealth bestows,
 The pleasure that from children flows,
 What'e'er we court in regal state
 That makes men covet to be great ;
 Whatever sweets we hope to find
 In love's delightful snares,
 Whatever good by Heaven assign'd,
 Whatever pause from cares,
 All flourish at thy smile divine :
 The spring of loveliness is thine ;
 And every joy that warms our hearts
 With thee approaches and departs.

THE ROSE. A FRAGMENT, ATTRIBUTED TO SAPPHO†.

Translated by Thomas Moore.

IF Jove would give the leafy bowers
 A Queen for all their world of flowers,
 The Rose would be the choice of Jove,
 And blush, the queen of every grove.
 Sweetest child of weeping morning,
 Gem, the vest of earth adorning,
 Eye of flowerets, glow of lawns,
 Bud of beauty nurs'd by dawns ;
 Soft the soul of love it breathes,
 Cypria's brow with magic wreathes,
 And to the Zephyr's warm caresses
 Diffuses all its verdant tresses,
 Till, glowing with the wanton's play,
 It blushes a diviner ray !

ODE.

From the Greek of Anacreon.Translated by Thomas Moore.*

OBSERVE when mother earth is dry,
 She drinks the droppings of the sky ;
 And then the dewy cordial gives
 To every thirsty plant that lives.
 And vapours which at evening weep,
 Are beverage to the swelling deep.
 And when the rosy sun appears,
 He drinks the ocean's misty tears.
 The moon too quaffs her paly stream
 Of lustre from the solar beam.
 Then hence with all your sober thinking,
 Since Nature's holy law is drinking ;
 I'll make the laws of Nature mine,
 And pledge the universe in wine.

CUPID BENIGHTED.

From the Greek of Anacreon.Translated by Francis Faukes.

THE sable night had spread around
 This nether world a gloom profound ;
 No silver moon nor stars appear,
 And strong Brètes urg'd the Bear :
 The race of man, with toils oppress'd
 Enjoy the balmy sweets of rest ;
 When from the heav'nly court of Jove
 Descended swift the god of love,
 (Ah me ! I tremble to relate)
 And loudly thunder'd at my gate.
 "Who's there ?" I cry'd, "Who breaks my door
 At this unseasonable hour !"
 The god, with well-dissembled sighs,
 And moan insidious thus replies :
 "Pray ope the door, dear Sir—'tis I,
 A harmless miserable boy ;
 Benumb'd with cold and rain I stray
 A long, uncomfortable way—
 The winds with blust'ring horror roar—
 'Tis dismal dark—Pray ope the door."
 Quite unsuspecting of a foe
 I listen'd to the tale of woe,
 Compassion touch'd my breast, and strait
 I struck a light, unbarr'd the gate ;
 When, lo ! a winged boy I spy'd,
 With bow and quiver at his side :
 I wonder'd at his strange attire ;
 Then friendly plac'd him near the fire.
 My heart was bounteous and benign,
 I warm'd his little hands in mine,
 Cheer'd him with kind assiduous care,
 And wrung the water from his hair.
 Soon as the frandful youth was warm,
 "Let's try," says he, "if any harm
 Has chanc'd my bow this stormy night ;
 I fear the wet has spoil'd it quite."
 With that he bent the fatal yew,
 And to the head an arrow drew :

‡ Nothing is known of the personal history of this poet.
 † This poetess flourished about the forty-second Olympiad.

* Anacreon was born in the second year of the fifty-fifth Olympiad.

Loud twang'd the sounding string, the dart
Pierced through my liver and my heart.
Then laugh'd amon the wanton boy,
And, "Friend," he cry'd, "I wish thee joy ;
Undamag'd is my bow, I see,
But what a wretch I've made of thee."

HIS MISTRESS'S PICTURE.

From the Greek of Anacreon.

BEST and happiest artisan,
Best of painters, if you can,
With your many-colour'd art
Paint the mistress of my heart ;
Describe the charms you hear from me
(Her charms you could not paint and see),
And make the absent nymph appear
As if her lovely self were here.

First draw her easy-flowing hair,
As soft and black as she is fair ;
And, if your art can rise so high,
Let breathing odours round her fly ;
Beneath the shade of flowing jet,
The ivory forehead smoothly set.
With care the sable brows extend,
And in two arches nicely bend,
That the fair space which lies between
The meeting shade may scarce be seen.
The eye must be uncommon fire,
Sparkle, languish, and desire ;
The flames unseen must yet be felt,
Like Pallas kill, like Venus melt.
The rosy cheeks must seem to glow
Amidst the white of new-fall'n snow.

Let her lips persuasion wear,
In silence elegantly fair :
As if the blushing rivals strove,
Breathing and inviting love.
Below her chin be sure to deck
With every grace her polish'd neck ;
While all that's pretty, soft, and sweet,
In the swelling bosom meet.
The rest in purple garments veil,
Her body, not her shape conceal.
Enough !—the lovely work is done,
The breathing paint will speak anon*.

THE CHOICE.

From the Greek of Moschus.

Translated by F. Faukes.

WHEN zephyrs gently curl the azure main,
On land impatient, I can scarce sustain
At ease to dwell ; a calm yields more delight :
But when old Ocean to a mountain's height
Rolls with tremendous roar, his foaming floods,
I loathe the sea, and sigh for fields and woods.

* The above translation appears in one of Steele's papers in The Guardian.

† Flourished about 290 years before Christ.

Safe is the land ; then piny forests please,
Though hoarse winds whistle through the bending trees

Hapless the fisher's life ! the sea his toil,
His house a bark, and faithless fish his spoil.
But O ! to me how sweet are slumbers, laid
Beneath a lofty plane's embowering shade :
And thence the tinkling of a rill to hear,
Whose sound gives pleasure unallayed by fear !

ANACREONTIC.

From the Greek of Julian.*

Translated by J. H. Mcrivale.

WHILE for my fair a wreath I twined
Of all the flowers which spring discloses,
It was my evil fate to find
Cupid lurking in the roses.

I seized the little struggling boy,
I plunged him in the manthng cup,
Then pledged it with a rapturous joy,
And mad with rapture drank him up.

But ever since, within my breast,
All uncontroll'd the urchin rages,
Disturbs my labour, breaks my rest,
And an eternal warfare wages.

PRAISE OF PHILOSOPHY.

From the Latin of Lucretius†.

Translated by Charles A. Elton.

'Tis sweet, when rising whirlwinds turbid sweep
O'er the great sea and heave its waters deep,
To stand upon a rock, and view from shore
Some other strive and buffet with the roar ;
Not that another's sufferings yield delight,
But ill's unfelt are pleasant to the sight.
'Tis sweet, remote from peril, to survey
The mighty battle roll its dense array
O'er the far plains ; and sweet to climb on high
The pinnacles of calm Philosophy,
And thence look down on those who wander wide
Life's mazy road, and search on every side ;
In rivalry the palm of genius claim ;
Contend for honours of a noble name ;
Toil with the break of morn, at midnight's hour ;
Emerge to wealth, or grasp the reins of power‡.

* Not Julian, the Apostle, but Julian the prefect of Egypt. See the Article on the Greek Anthology in Blackwood's Magazine, July, 1833.

† Lucretius was born about the second year of the 171st Olympiad—or about the 65th year of Rome.

‡ Lord Bacon has given a translation of a part of this passage in his Essay on Truth.—"It is a pleasure to stand upon the shore and to see ships tost upon the sea ; a pleasure to stand in the window of a castle, and to see a battle, and the adventures thereof below ; but no pleasure is comparable to the standing upon the vantage ground of truth (a hill not to be commanded, and where the air is always clear and serene), and to see the errors, and wanderings, and mists, and tempests in the vale below ; so always that this prospect be with pity, and not with swelling or pride."

TROY BESIEGED BY THE GREEKS.—FRIENDSHIP OF NISUS AND EURYALUS: THEIR UNHAPPY FATE.

From the Latin of Virgil.*

Translated by John Dryden.

THE post of honour to Messapus falls,
To keep the nightly guard ; to watch the walls ;
To pitch the fires at distances around,
And close the Trojans in their scanty ground.
Twice seven Rutulian captains ready stand :
And twice seven hundred horse their chiefs command :

All clad in shining arms the works invest ;
Each with a radiant helm, and waving crest.
Stretch'd at their length, they press the grassy
ground ;

They laugh, they sing, the jolly howls go round :
With lights and cheerful fires renew the day ;
And pass the wakeful night in feasts and play.

The Trojans, from above, their foes beheld ;
And with arm'd legions all the rampires fill'd :
Seiz'd with affright, their gates they first explore ;
Join works to works with bridges ; tower to tower :
Thus all things needful for defence abound ;
Mnestheus and brave Seresthus walk the round :
Commission'd by their absent prince to share
The common danger, and divide the care,
The soldiers draw their lots ; and, as they fall,
By turns relieve each other on the wall.

Nigh were the foes their utmost guards advance
To watch the gate, was warlike Nisus' chance.
His father Hirtucus of noble blood ;
His mother was a huntress of the wood ;
And sent him to the wars ; well could he bear
His lance in fight, and dart the flying spear :
But, better skill'd unerring shafts to send,
Beside him stood Euryalus his friend.
Euryalus, than whom the Trojan host
No fairer face, or sweeter air could boast.
Scarce had the down to shade his cheeks begun ;
One was their care, and their delight was one.
One common hazard in the war they shar'd ;
And now were both, by choice, upon the guard.

Then Nisus, thus : Or do the gods inspire
This warmth, or make we gods of our desire ?
A generous ardour boils within my breast,
Eager of action, enemy to rest ;
This urges me to fight, and fires my mind,
To leave a memorable name behind.
Thou seest the foe secure : how faintly shine
Their scatter'd fires ! the most in sleep supine
Along the ground an easy conquest lie ;
The wakeful few the flaming flaggon ply :
All hush around. Now hear what I revolve ;
A thought unripe, and scarcely yet resolve.
Our absent prince both camp and council mourn ;
By message both would hasten his return :
If they confer what I demand on thee
(For fame is recompence enough for me),
Methinks beneath yon hill, I have spy'd
A way that safely will my passage guide.

Euryalus stood listening while he spoke,
With love of praise, and noble envy struck ;
Then to his ardent friend expos'd his mind :
All this alone, and leaving me behind,
Am I unworthy, Nisus, to be join'd ?
Think'st thou I can, my share of glory yield,
Or send thee unassisted to the field ?
Not so my father taught my childhood arms,
Born in a siege, and bred among alarms ;
Nor is my youth unworthy of my friend,
Nor of the heaven-born hero I attend
The thing call'd life, with ease I can disclaim,
And think it over-sold to purchase fame.

Then Nisus, thus : Alas ! thy tender years
Would minister new matter to my fears ;
So may the gods, who view this friendly strife,
Restore me to thy lov'd embrace with life,
Condemn'd to pay my vows (as sure I trust)
This thy request is cruel and unjust.
But if some chance, as many chances are,
And doubtful hazards in the deeds of war :
If one should reach my head, there let it fall,
And spare thy life : I would not perish all.
Thy bloomy youth deserves a longer date :
Live thou to mourn thy love's unhappy fate :
To bear my mangled body from the foe ;
Or buy it back, and funeral rites bestow.
Or, if hard fortune shall those dues deny,
Thou canst at least an empty tomb supply.
O let me not the widow's tears renew :
Nor let a mother's curse my name pursue ;
Thy pious parent, who, for love of thee,
Forsook the coasts of friendly Sicily.
Her age committing to the seas and wind,
When every weary matron staid behind.
To this Euryalus : You plead in vain,
And but protract the cause you cannot gain ;
No more delays, but haste. With that he wakes
The nodding watch ; each to his office takes.
The guard reliev'd, the generous couple went
To find the council at the royal tent.
All creatures else forgot their daily care ;
And sleep, the common gift of nature, share :
Except the Trojan peers, who wakeful sate
In nightly council for th' endanger'd state.
They vote a message to their absent chief ;
Show their distress, and beg a swift relief.
Amid the camp a silent seat they chose,
Remote their clamour, and secure from foes,
On their left arms their ample shields they bear,
Their right reclin'd upon the bending spear,
Now Nisus and his friend approach the guard,
And beg admission eager to be heard ;
Th' affair important, not to be deferr'd
Ascanius bids them be conducted in ;
Ordering the more experienc'd to begin.
Then Nisus thus : Ye fathers, lend your ears,
Nor judge our bold attempt beyond our years.
The foe, securely drench'd in sleep and wine,
Neglect their watch ; the fires but thinly shine ;
And where the smoke in cloudy vapours flies,
Covering the plain, and curling to the skies,
Betwixt two paths, which at the gate divide,
Close by the sea, a passage we have spy'd,

* Virgil flourished in the time of Augustus, and was born in the year of Rome 683. He died at the age of 54.

Which will our way to great Æneas guide.
 Expect each hour to see him safe again,
 Loaded with spoils of foes in battle slain.
 Snatch we the lucky minute while we may ;
 Nor can we be mistaken in the way ;
 For, hunting in the vales, we both have seen
 The rising turrets, and the stream between :
 And know the winding course, with every ford.
 He ceas'd ; and old Ælethes took the word.
 Our country gods, in whom our trust we place
 Will yet from ruin save the Trojan race :
 While we behold such dauntless worth appear
 In dawning youth, and souls so void of fear.
 Then into tears of joy the father broke ;
 Each in his longing arms by turns he took :
 Panted, and paus'd ; and thus again he spoke :
 Ye brave young men, what equal gifts can we,
 In recompence of such desert, decree ?
 The greatest sure, and best you can receive,
 The gods, and your own conscious worth, will give.

The rest our grateful general will bestow ;
 And young Ascanius till his manhood owe.

And I, whose welfare in my father lies,
 Ascanius adds, by the great deities,
 By my dear country, by my household-gods,
 By hoary Vesta's rites, and dark abodes,
 Adjure you both (on you my fortune stands,
 That and my faith I plight into your hands) :
 Make me but happy in his safe return,
 Whose wonted presence I can only mourn,
 Your common gift shall two large goblets be,
 Of silver, wrought with curious imagery ;
 And high emboss'd, which, when old Priam reign'd,
 My conquering sire at sack'd Arisba gain'd.
 And more, two tripods cast in antique mould,
 With two great talents of the finest gold :
 Beside a costly bowl, engrav'd with art,
 Which Dido gave when first she gave her heart.
 But it in conquer'd Italy we reign,
 When spoils by lot the victor shall obtain,
 Thou saw'st the courser by proud Turnus press'd,
 That, Nisus, and his arms, and nodding crest,
 And shield, from chance exempt, shall be thy
 share ;

Twelve labouring slaves, twelve handmaids young and fair,

And clad in rich attire, and train'd with care.
 And last, a Latian field with fruitful plains,
 And a large portion of the king's domains.
 But thou, whose years are more to mine ally'd,
 No fate my vow'd affection shall divide
 From thee, heroic youth ; be wholly mine :
 Take full possession ; all my soul is thine.
 One faith, one fame, one fate, shall both attend ;
 My life's companion, and my bosom friend ;
 My peace shall be committed to thy care,
 And to thy conduct my concerns in war.

Then thus the young Euryalus reply'd :
 Whatever fortune, good or bad, betide,
 The same shall be my age, as now my youth
 No time shall find me wanting to my truth.
 This only from your goodness let me gain
 (And this ungranted, all rewards are vain) :

Of Priam's royal race my mother came,
 And sure the best that ever bore the name :
 Whom neither Troy, nor Sicily could hold
 From me departing, but, o'erspent, and old,
 My fate she follow'd ; ignorant of this,
 Whatever danger, neither parting kiss,
 Nor pious blessing taken, her I leave ;
 And, in this only act of all my life deceive.
 By this right hand, and conscious might I swear,
 My soul so sad a farewell could not bear.
 Be you her comfort ; fill my vacant place
 (Permit me to resume so great a grace).
 Support her age, forsaken and distress'd ;
 That hope alone will fortify my breast
 Against the worst of fortunes, and of fears.
 He said : the mov'd assistants melt in tears,
 Then thus Ascanius (wonder-struck to see
 That image of his filial piety) :

So great beginnings, in so green an age,
 Exact the faith, which I again engage.
 Thy mother all the dues shall justly claim,
 Creusa had : and only want the name.
 Whate'er event thy bold attempt shall have,
 'Tis merit to have borne a son so brave.
 Now by my head, a sacred oath, I swear,
 (My father us'd it) what returning here
 Crown'd with success, I for thyself prepare,
 That, if thou fail, shall thy lov'd mother share.

He said ; and weeping while he spoke the word,
 From his broad belt he drew a shining sword,
 Magnificent with gold. Lycæon made,
 And in an ivory scabbard sheath'd the blade :
 This was his gift : great Mnesthus gave his friend
 A lion's hide, his body to defend :
 And good Ælethes furnish'd him beside,
 With his own trusty helm, of temper try'd.

Thus arm'd they went. The noble Trojans wait
 Their issuing forth, and follow to the gate.
 With prayers and vows, above the rest appears
 Ascanius, manly far beyond his years,
 And messages committed to their care,
 Which all in winds were lost, and flitting air.

The trenches first they pass'd ; then took their way
 Where their proud foes in pitch'd pavilions lay ;
 To many fatal, ere themselves were slain : [plain.
 They found the careless host dispers'd upon the
 Who, gorg'd, and drunk with wine, supinely snore ;
 Unharness'd chariots stand along the shore ;
 Amidst the wheels and reins, the goblet by,
 A medley of debauch and war they lie.
 Observing Nisus show'd his friend the sight ;
 Behold a conquest gain'd without a fight.
 Occasion offers, and I stand prepar'd ;
 There lies our way ; be thou upon the guard,
 And look around, while I securely go,
 And hew a passage through the sleeping foe.
 Softly he spoke ; then, striding, took his way,
 With his drawn sword, where haughty Rhamnes lay :
 His head rais'd high, on tapestry beneath,
 And heaving from his breast, he drew his breath :
 A king and prophet by king Turnus lov'd ;
 But fate by prescience cannot be remov'd ;
 Him, and his sleeping slaves, he slew. Then spies

Where Rhemus, with his rich retinue, lies :
 His armour-bearer first, and next he kills
 His charioteer, intrench'd betwixt the wheels :
 And his lov'd horses : last invades their lord ;
 Full on his neck he drives the fatal sword :
 The gasping head flies off ; a purple flood
 Flows from the trunk, that welters in the blood :
 Which, by the spurning heels, dispers'd around,
 The bed besprinkles, and bedews the ground.
 Lamus the bold, and Lamyris the strong,
 He slew ; and then Serranus fair and young.
 From dice and wine the youth retir'd to rest,
 And puff'd the fummy god from out his breast :
 Ev'n then he dreamt of drink and lucky play ;
 More lucky had it lasted till the day.

The famish'd lion thus, with hunger bold,
 O'erleaps the fences of the nightly fold ;
 And tears the peaceful flocks ; with silent awe
 Trembling they lie, and pant beneath his paw.
 Nor with less rage Euryalus employs
 The wrathful sword, or fewer foes destroys :
 But on th' ignoble crowd his fury flows ;
 He Fadus, Hebesus, and Rhætus slew.
 Oppress'd with heavy sleep the former fall,
 But Rhætus, wakeful, and observing all,
 Behind a spacious jar he shrink'd for fear ;
 The fatal iron found, and reach'd him there.
 For, as he rose, it pierc'd his naked side,
 And, reeking, thence return'd in crimson dy'd.
 The wound pours out a stream of wine and blood :
 The purple soul comes floating in the flood.

Now where Messapus quarter'd they arrive ;
 The fires were fainting there, and just alive.
 The warrior-horses tied in order fed ;
 Nisus observ'd the discipline, and said,
 Our eager thirst of blood may both betray ;
 And see the scatter'd streaks of dawning day,
 For to nocturnal theft : no more, my friend,
 Here let our glutt'd execution end ;
 A lane through slaughter'd bodies we have made ;
 The bold Euryalus, though loth, obey'd,
 Of arms, and arras, and of plate they find
 A precious load ; but these they leave behind.
 Yet, fond of gaudy spoils, the boy would stay
 To make the rich caparison his prey,
 Which on the steed of conquer'd Rhannes lay.
 Nor did his eyes less longingly behold
 The girdle belt, with nails of burnish'd gold.
 This present Cedicus the rich bestow'd
 On Remulus, when friendship first they vow'd ;
 And absent, join'd in hospitable ties ;
 He dying, to his heir bequeath'd the prize :
 Till by the conquering Ardean troops oppress'd,
 He fell ; and they the glorious gift possess'd.
 These glittering spoils (now made the victor's gain)
 He to his body suits ; but suits in vain.
 Messapus' helm he finds among the rest,
 And laces on, and wears the waving crest.
 Proud of their conquest, prouder of their prey,
 They leave the camp, and take the ready way.
 But far they had not pass'd, before they spy'd
 Three hundred horse with Volscens for their guide.
 The queen a legion to king Turnus sent,
 But the swift horse the slower foot prevent ;

And now, advancing, sought the leader's tent.
 They saw the pair ; for thro' the doubtful shade
 His shining helm Euryalus betray'd,
 On which the moon with full reflection play'd,
 'Tis not for nought, cry'd Volscens, from the crowd,
 These men go there ; then rais'd his voice aloud :
 Stand, stand : why thus in arms, and whither bent :
 From whence, to whom, and on what errand sent ?
 Silent they scud away, and haste their flight
 To neighbouring woods, and trust themselves to night.
 The speedy horse all passages belay,
 And spur their smoking steeds to cross their way ;
 And watch each entrance of the winding wood ;
 Black was the forest, thick with beech it stood ;
 Horrid with fern, and intricate with thorn,
 Few paths of human feet or tracks of beasts were worn.

The darkness of the shades, his heavy prey,
 And fear misled the younger from his way.
 But Nisus hit the turns with happier haste,
 And, thoughtless of his friend, the forest pass'd ;
 And Alban plains, from Alba's name so call'd,
 Where king Latinus then his oxen stall'd.
 Till, turning at the length, he stood his ground,
 And miss'd his friend, and cast his eyes around :
 Ah wretch, he cry'd, where have I left behind
 Th' unhappy youth ; where shall I hope to find ;
 Or what way take ! Again he ventures back :
 And treads the mazes of his former track,
 He winds the wood, and listening hears the noise
 Of trampling coursers, and the rider's voice.
 The sound approach'd, and suddenly he view'd
 The foes enclosing, and his friend pursu'd :
 Forelay'd and taken, while he strove in vain,
 The shelter of the friendly shades to gain.
 What should he next attempt ? What arms employ ?
 What fruitless force to free the captive boy ;
 Or desperate should he rush and lose his life,
 With odds oppress, in such unequal strife ?
 Resolv'd at length his pointed spear he took ;
 And casting on the moon a mournful look,
 Guardian of groves, and goddess of the night,
 Fair queen, he said, direct my dart aright :
 If e'er my pious father for my sake,
 Did grateful offerings on thy altars make ;
 Or I increas'd them with my sylvan toils,
 And hung the holy roofs with savage spoils,
 Give me to scatter these. Then from his ear
 He pois'd, and aim'd, and launch'd the trembling spear.

The deadly weapon, hissing from the grove,
 Impetuous on the back of Sulmo rove ;
 Pierc'd his thin armour, drank his vital blood,
 And in his body left the broken wood.
 He staggers round ; his eye-balls roll in death,
 And with short sobs he gasps away his breath.
 All stand amaz'd ; a second javelin flies
 With equal strength, and quivers thro' the skies :
 This through thy temples, Tagus, forc'd the way,
 And in the brain-pan warmly buried lay.
 Fierce Volscens foams with rage, and gazing round,
 Descri'd not him who gave the fatal wound :
 Nor knew to fix revenge. But thou, he cries,
 Shall pay for both, and at the prisoner flies

With his drawn sword. Then struck with deep despair,
 That cruel sight the lover could not bear :
 But from his covert rush'd in open view ;
 And sent his voice before him as he flew :
 Me, me, he cry'd, turn all your swords alone
 On me ; the fact confess'd, the fault my own.
 He neither could nor durst, the guiltless youth ;
 Ye moon and stars, bear witness to the truth !
 His only crime (if friendship can offend)
 Is too much love to his unhappy friend.
 Too late he speaks ; the sword, which fury guides,
 Driven with full force, had pierc'd his tender sides.
 Down fell the beauteous youth ; the yawning wound
 Gush'd out a purple stream, and stain'd the ground.
 His snowy neck reclines upon his breast,
 Like a fair flower by the keen share oppress'd :
 Like a white poppy sinking on the plain,
 Whose heavy head is overcharg'd with rain.
 Despair, and rage, and vengeance justly vow'd,
 Drove Nisus headlong on the hostile crowd :
 Volsens he seeks : on him alone he bends ;
 Borne back, and bor'd, by his surrounding friends,
 Onward he press'd ; and kept him still in sight ;
 Then whirl'd aloft his sword with all his might :
 Th' unerring steel descended while he spoke Pierc'd his wide mouth, and through his weazen broke :

Dying he flew ; and staggering on the plain,
 With swimming eyes he sought his lover slain :
 Then quiet on his bleeding bosom fell ;
 Content in death to be reveng'd so well.

O happy friends ! for, if my verse can give,
 Immortal life, your fame, shall ever live :
 Fix'd as the capitol's foundation lies ;
 And spread where'er the Roman eagle flies !

The conquering party first divide the prey,
 Then their slain leader to the camp convey.
 With wonder, as they went, the troops were fill'd,
 To see such numbers whom so few had kill'd.
 Serranus, Rhamnes, and the rest they found :
 Vast crowds the dying and the dead surround :
 And the yet reeking blood o'erflows the ground.
 All knew the helmet which Messapus lost ;
 But mourn'd a purchase that so dear had cost.
 Now rose the ruddy morn from Tithon's bed ;
 And, with the dawn of day, the skies o'erspread.
 Nor long the sun his daily course withheld,
 But added colours to the world reveal'd.
 When early Turnus, wakening with the light,
 All clad in armour, calls his troops to fight.
 His martial men with fierce harangues he fir'd ;
 And his own ardour in their souls inspir'd.

This done, to give new terror to his foes,
 The heads of Nisus, and his friend he shows,
 Rais'd high on pointed spears : a ghastly sight ;
 Loud peals of shouts ensue, and barbarous delight.

Meantime the Trojans run, where danger calls ;
 They line their trenches, and they man their walls :
 In front extended to the left they stood :

Safe was the right surrounded by the flood.

But casting from their towers a frightful view,
 They saw the faces which too well they knew ;
 Though then disguis'd in death, and smear'd all o'er

With filth obscene, and dropping putrid gore,
 Soon hasty fame, through the sad city bears
 The mournful message to the mother's ears :
 An icy cold benumbs her limbs : she shakes :
 Her cheeks the blood, her hand the web forsakes,
 She runs the rampires round amidst the war,
 Nor fears the flying darts : she rends her hair,
 And fills with loud laments the liquid air.
 Thus then, my lov'd Euryalus appears !
 Thus looks the prop of my declining years !
 Was't on his face my famish'd eyes I fed !
 Ah how unlike the living is the dead ?
 And couldst thou leave me, cruel, thus alone,
 Not one kind kiss from a departing son !
 No look, no last adieu before he went,
 In an ill-boding hour to slaughter sent !
 Cold on the ground, and pressing foreign clay,
 To Latian dogs and fowls he lies a prey !
 Nor was I near to close his dying eyes,
 To wash his wounds, to weep his obsequies ;
 To call about his corpse his crying friends,
 Or spread the mantle (made for other ends)
 On his dear body, which I wove with care,
 Nor did my daily pains, or nightly labour spare.
 Where shall I find his corpse ? What earth sustains
 His trunk dismember'd, and his cold remains ?
 For this, alas ! I left my needful ease,
 Expos'd my life to winds, and winter seas !
 If any pity touch Rutulian hearts,
 Here empty all your quivers, all your darts :
 Or if they fail, thou Jove conclude my woe,
 And send me thunder-struck to shades below !
 Her shrieks and clamours pierce the Trojans' ears,
 Unman their courage and augment their fears :
 Nor young Ascanius could the sight sustain,
 Nor old Ilioneus his tears restrain :
 But Actor and Idæus, jointly sent,
 To bear the madding mother to her tent.

NIGHT SCENE.

From the Latin of Virgil.

• Translated by John Dryden.

'Twas dead of night, when weary bodies close
 Their eyes in balmy sleep and soft repose :
 The winds no longer whisper through the woods.
 Nor murmuring tides disturb the gentle floods ;
 The stars in silent order moved around,
 And peace, with downy wings, was brooding on the ground.

The flocks and herds, and party colored fowl,
 Which haunt the woods, or swim the weedy pool,
 Stretched on the quiet earth securely lay,
 Forgetting the past labors of the day.
 All else of Nature's common gift partake ;
 Unhappy Dido was alone awake*.

[Æneis, Book IV.]

* The following is Pitt's translation of the same scene.

'Twas night ; and weary with the toils of day,
 In soft repose the whole creation lay,
 The murmers of the groves and surges die
 The stars roll solemn through the glowing sky ;

RURAL HAPPINESS*.

From the Latin of Virgil.Translated by Dryden.

O HAPPY, if he knew his happy state,
The swain, who, free from business and debate,
Receives his easy food from Nature's hand,
And just returns of cultivated land !
No palace, with a lofty gate, he wants,
To admit the tides of early visitants,

Wide o'er the fields a brooding silence reigns,
The flocks lie stretched beneath the flowery plains.
The furious savages that haunt the woods,
The painted birds, the fishes of the floods;
All, all, beneath the general darkness, share
In sleep, a soft forgetfulness of care ;
All but the hopeless Queen, &c.

In the notes to Fawkes's translation of the Argonautics of Apollonius Rhodius it is observed that the following passage evidently furnished Virgil with the hint of his night scene.

Now rising shades a solemn scene display
O'er the wide earth, and o'er the ethereal way ;
All night the sailor marks the northern team
And golden circlet of Orion's beam ;
A deep repose the weary watchman shares,
And the faint wanderer sleeps away his cares !
E'en the fond maid, while yet all breathless lies
Her child of love, in slumber seals her eyes.
No sound of village-dog, no noise invades
The deathlike silence of the midnight shades,
Alone Medea wakes ;—&c.

[Argonautics, Book III.]

I leave the reader to form his own opinion of the comparative merits of these descriptions.—Computer.

* As this is a very celebrated passage it may be as well to give more than one translation. Dryden's is very spirited but it is rather too paraphrastic. The original consists of 17 lines, of which Dryden has made 34. The following translation by Sotheby is much closer. I have tried myself to produce one rather closer even than his, but with what success the classical reader will determine. I have not hesitated, in two or three places, to use the same expressions when perfectly true to the original.—Computer.

Am I happy swain ! ah ! race beloved of heaven !
Too blest, if conscious of the blessing given !
For the just Earth from her prolific beds,
Far from wild war spontaneous plenty sheds—
Though nor high domes thro' all their portals wide,
Each morn disgorge the flatterer's refulgent tide ;
Though nor thy gaze on tortoise columns rest,
The Ephyrean brass, and gold wrought vest,
Nor poisoning Tyre thy snowy fleeces soil
Nor Cassia taint thy uncorrupted oil ;
Yet peace is thine, and life that knows no change,
And various wealth in nature's boundless range.
The grot, the living fount, the umbrageous glade,
And lowing herds, and sheep in soothing shade,
Thine, all of tame and wild, in lawn and field !
That pastured plains or savage woodlands yield ;
Content and patience youth's long toils assuage,
Repose and reverence tend declining age.
There hallow'd shrines, and, as she fled mankind,
There Justice left her last lone trace behind.

Sotheby.

Am I happy swains ! if they their bliss but knew,
Whom far from boisterous war, Earth's bosom true
With easy food supplies. If they behold,
No lofty dome its gorgeous gates unfold,
And pour at morn from all its chambers wide
Of flattering visitants the mighty tide,
Nor gaze on beauteous columns richly wrought,
Or tissued robes or busts from Corinth brought ;
Nor their white wool with Tyrian poison soil,
Nor taint with Cassia's bark their native oil ;
Yet peace is theirs ; a life true bliss that yields ;
And various wealth, leisure mid ample fields,
Grottoes, and living lakes, and valleys green,
And lowing herds, and 'neath a sylvan screen
Delicious slumbers. There the lawn and cave
With beasts of chase abound. The young ne'er crave
A prouder lot ; their patient toil is cheered ;
Their gods are worshipped, and their sires revered ;
And there when Justice passed from earth away
She left the latest traces of her sway. D. L. R.

With eager eyes devouring, as they pass,
The breathing figures of Corinthian brass.
No statues threaten from high pedestals ;
No Persian arras hides his homely walls,
With antic vests, which through their shady fold,
Betray the streaks of ill dissembled gold :
He boasts no wool whose native white is dyed
With purple poison of Assyrian pride :
No costly drugs of Araby defile
With foreign scents the sweetness of his oil ;
But easy quiet, a secure retreat,
A harmless life that knows not how to cheat,
With home-bred plenty, the rich owner bless ;
And rural pleasures crown his happiness.
Unvex'd with quarrels, undisturb'd with noise,
The country king his peaceful realm enjoys—
Cool grots, and living lakes, the flowery pride
Of meads, and streams that through the valley glide,
And shady groves that easy sleep invite,
And, after toilsome days, a soft repose at night.
Wild beasts of nature in his woods abound ;
And youth, of labour patient, plough the ground,
Inured to hardship and to homely fare.
Nor venerable age is wanting there,
In great examples to the youthful train ;
Nor are the gods adored with rites profane.
From hence Astræa took her flight, and here
The prints of her departing steps appear.

[Georgics, Book II.]

TO CHLOE.

From the Latin of Horace.Translated by Dr. Philip Francis.*

Chloe being now marriageable, Horace reproves her affected coyness.

CHLOE flies me like a fawn,
Which through some sequester'd lawn
Panting seeks the mother deer,
Not without a panic fear
Of the gently-breathing breeze,
And the motion of the trees.
If the curling leaves but shake,
If a lizard stir the brake,
Frighted it begins to freeze,
Trembling both at heart and knees.
But not like a tiger dire,
Nor a lion, fraught with ire,
I pursue my lovely game
To destroy her tender frame.

TO VIRGIL.

From the same, and by the same translator.

Horace admonishes his friend to bear with patience the death of Quintilius.

WHEREFORE restrain the tender tear ?
Why blush to weep for one so dear ?
Sweet muse, of melting voice and lyre,
Do thou the mournful song inspire.
Quintilius—sunk to endless rest,
With death's eternal sleep oppress'd !

* Horace was born 65 years before Christ or in the year of Rome 746.

Oh ! when shall Faith, of soul sincere,
Of Justice pure the sister fair,
And Modesty, unspotted maid,
And Truth in artless guise array'd,
Among the race of humankind
An equal to Quintilius find ?

How did the good, the virtuous mourn,
And pour their sorrows o'er his urn ?
But, Virgil, thine the loudest strain ;
Yet all thy pious grief is vain.
In vain do you the gods implore
Thy loved Quintilius to restore ;
Whom on far other terms they gave,
By nature fated to the grave.

What though you can the lyre command,
And sweep its tones with softer hand
Than Orpheus, whose harmonious song
Once drew the list'ning trees along,
Yet ne'er returns the vital heat*.
The shadowy form to animate :
For when the ghost-compelling god
Forms his black troops with horrid rod,
He will not, lenient to the breath
Of prayer, unbar the gates of death.
'Tis hard : but patience must endure,
And soothe the woes it cannot cure.

TO APOLLO.

From the same, and by the same translator.

Horace asserts that a sound state of body and mind, together with a taste for poetry, exceeds all other blessings of life.

WHEN at Apollo's hallow'd shrue
The poet hails the power divine,
And here his first libations pours,
What is the blessing he implores ?
He nor desires the swelling grain ;
That yellows o'er Sardinia's plain ;
Nor the fair herds, that lowing feed
On warm Calabria's flowery mead ;
Nor ivory, of spotless shine ;
Nor gold, forth-flaming from its mine ;
Nor the rich fields, that Liris laves,
And eats away with silent waves.

Let others quaff the racy wine,
To whom kind Fortune gives the vine ;
The golden goblet let him drain
Who vent'rous ploughs the Atlantic main,
Bless'd with three safe returns a year,
For he to every god is dear.

To me boon Nature frankly yields
Her wholesome sallad from the fields ;
Nor ask I more, than sense and health
Still to enjoy my present wealth.
From age and all its weakness free
Oh son of Jove, preserved by thee,
Give me to strike the tuneful lyre,
And thou my latest song inspire !

* The theology of the ancients taught, that when a man was dead, his soul or the spiritual part of him went to heaven ; that his body continued in the earth ; and his image or shadow went to hell. The image was a corporeal part of the soul, a kind of subtle body, with which it was clothed.—This and the following notes are by various commentators. They are given in Francis's Horace.

TO CRISPUS SALLUSTIUS*.

From the same, and by the same translator.

In this ode the proper use of riches is delineated, together with the happiness of that man who can subdue his passions.

GOLD hath no lustre of its own,
It shines by temperate use alone,
And when in earth it hoarded lies,
My Sallust can the mass despise.
With never-failing wing shall fame
To latest ages bear the name
Of Procleius†, who could prove
A father, in a brother's love.
By virtue's precepts to control
The furious passions of the soul
Is over wider realms to reign,
Unenvied monarch, than if Spain
You could to distant Libya join,
And both the Carthages were thine.
The dropsy, by indulgence nursed,
Pursues us with increasing thirst,
Till art expels the cause, and drains
The wat'ry languor from our veins‡.
But virtue can the crowd unteach
Their false, mistaken forms of speech ;
Virtue, to crowds a foe profess'd,
Disdains to number with the bless'd
Phraates, by his slaves adored,
And to the Parthian crown restored,
But gives the diadem, the throne,
And laurel wreath to him alone,
Who can a treasured mass of gold
With firm, undazzled eye behold.

TO LYDIA§.

From the same, and by the same translator.

A Dialogue between Horace and Lydia.

Horace. WHILE I was pleasing to your arms,
Nor any youth of happier charms,
Thy snowy bosom blissful press'd,
Not Persia's king like me was bless'd.

Lydia. While for no other far you burn'd,
Nor Lydia was for Chloe scorn'd,
What maid was then so bless'd as thine ?
Not Ilia's fame could equal mine.

* Sallust was a courtier of a philosophical character. Contented with the rank in which he was born, like a faithful follower of Epicurus he knew how to join an open, unbounded luxury to a laborious care of the public affairs ; and the poet, in setting forth the maxims of Epicurean philosophy, seems indirectly to applaud the person who could thus bound his desires, and enjoy with honor the considerable fortune his uncle had raised.

† Procleius had two brothers, Terentius and Licinius. Terentius was designed consul in the year seven hundred and thirty, but died before he could enter on his office. Licinius unfortunately engaged himself in a conspiracy against Augustus, nor could all the interest of his brother Procleius and Mecenas, who had married their sister Terentia, preserve him from banishment. An old commentator relates a particular story, which greatly enlightens this passage. He says that Procleius divided his patrimony with his brothers, whose fortunes were ruined in the civil wars.

‡ The ancients frequently compared the covetous and ambitious to persons afflicted with a dropsy. Water only irritates the thirst of the one, as honors and riches provoke the insatiable appetite of the other. Indeed great fortunes rather enlarge, than fill our desires.

§ Horace in this ode hath found an art of joining the politeness of courts to the simplicity of the country.

H. Now Chloe reigns ; her voice and lyre
Melt down the soul to soft desire,
Nor will I fear e'en death, to save*
Her dearer beauties from the grave.

L. My heart young Calais inspires,
Whose bosom glows with mutual fires,
For whom I twice would die with joy,
If death would spare the charming boy.

H. Yet what if love, whose bands we broke,
Again should tame us to the yoke ;
Should I shake off bright Chloe's chain,
And take my Lydia home again† ?—

L. Though he exceed in beauty far
The rising lustre of a star ;
Though light as cork thy fancy strays,
Thy passions wild as angry seas,
When vex'd with storms ; yet gladly I
With thee would live, with thee would die.

TO THE FOUNTAIN BANDUSIA†.

From the same, and by the same translator.

Horace promises to the fountain a sacrifice, and renown from his verses.

FOUNTAIN, whose waters far surpass
The shining face of polish'd glass,
To thee, the goblet, crown'd with flowers,
Grateful the rich libation pours ;
A goat, whose horns begin to spread,
And bending arm his swelling head,
Whose bosom glows with young desires,
Now war, or kindling love inspires,
Now meditates his blow in vain,——
His blood shall thy fair fountain stain.
When the fierce dogstar's fervid ray
Flames forth, and sets on fire the day.
To vagrant flocks, that range the field,
You a refreshing coolness yield.
Or to the labor-wearied Team
Pour forth the freshness of thy stream.
Soon shalt thou flow a noble spring,
While in immortal verse I sing
The oak, that spreads thy rocks around,
From whence thy babbling waters bound.

* According to the superstition of the ancients, who believed that the death of one person might be prevented by that of another. From hence came the custom of those devotements, made for the lives of princes.

† Horace was willing to try whether Lydia would consent to a reconciliation ; but, to avoid a refusal, he leaves the sense unfinished, and rather insinuates than expresses his own inclination ; or perhaps the break is owing to the warmth of Lydia, who interrupts him, and prevents what he was going to say.

‡ A beautiful fountain in the estate of a great poet ought to be immortal ; and surely as long as the name of Horace shall live, or as long as poetry shall be loved, the name of Bandusia shall be remembered among the poetical fountains Castalia, Aganippe, Hippocrene, &c. There is in this ode an inimitable simplicity of description, and it is yet more valuable, as it is a curious example of the sacrifices offered to fountains, or rather to the deities who presided over them.

TO TORQUATUS.

From the same, and by the same translator.

Horace exhorts Torquatus to live in a cheerful and joyous manner, by representing to him the certainty of death.

THE snow dissolves, the field its verdure spreads,
The trees high wave in air their leafy heads ;
Earth feels the change ; the rivers calm subside,
And smooth along their banks decreasing glide ;
The elder Grace, with her fair sister-train,
In naked beauty dances o'er the plain.
The circling Hours, that swiftly wing their way,
And in their flight consume the smiling day ;
Those circling Hours, and all the various year,
Convince us nothing is immortal here.

In vernal gales cold winter melts away ;
Soon wastes the spring in summer's burning ray :
Yet summer dies in autumn's fruitful reign,
And slow-paced winter soon returns again.
The moon renews her orb with growing light ;
But when we sink into the depths of night*,
Where all the good, the rich, the brave are laid,
Our best remains are ashes and a shade.

Who knows, that heaven, with ever-bounteous power†,

Shall add to-morrow to the present hour ?
The wealth, you give to pleasure and delight,
Far from thy ravening heir shall speed its flight :
But soon as Minos, throned in awful state,
Shall o'er thee speak the solemn words of fate,
Nor virtue, birth, nor eloquence divine,
Shall bid the grave its destined prey resign :
Nor chaste Diana from infernal night
Could bring her modest favorite back to light ;
And hell-descending Theseus strove in vain
To break his amorous friend's Lethean chain.

THE DOG IN THE RIVER.

From the Latin of Phadrus.

Translated by Christopher Smart.

THE churl that wants another's fare
Deserves at least to lose his share.
As through the stream a dog convey'd
A piece of meat, he spied his shade
In the clear mirror of the flood,
And thinking it was flesh and blood,
Snapp'd to deprive him of the treat :—
But mark the glutton's self-defeat,
Miss'd both another's and his own,
Both shade and substance, beef and bone.

* The seasons return and are renewed, but man dies once, and for ever. There is a beautiful passage in the third Idyllium of Moschus on the death of Bion, which perhaps our poet had in his view.

Our plants and trees revive ; the breathing rose
With annual youth, in pride of beauty glows ;
But when the masterpiece of nature dies,
Man, who alone is great, and grave, and wise ;
No more he rises to the realms of light,
But sleeps unwaking in eternal night.

† This is a second motive to persuade Torquatus not to neglect any opportunity of pleasure. It is even more pressing than the first ; for to represent to a man that he shall certainly die hereafter, is not so forcibly a manner of bidding him enjoy the present hour, as if he told him perhaps he may die to-morrow. To deter our pleasures is probably to lose them for ever, and death is a law which Nature publishes through all her works.

‡ Little is known of the personal history of this writer. The date of his birth is not recorded, but he is supposed to have lived to the age of seventy. He was patronized by Augustus.

THE STAG AT THE FOUNTAIN.

From the same, and by the same translator.

FULL often what you now despise
Proves better than the things you prize ;
Let Esop's narrative decide :

A Stag beheld, with conscious pride,
(As at the fountain-head he stood)
His image in the silver flood,
And there extols his branching horns,
While his poor spindle-shanks he scorns—
But, lo ! he hears the hunter's cries,
And, frighten'd, o'er the champaign flies—
His swiftness baffles the pursuit ;
At length a wood receives the brute,
And by his horns entangled there,
The pack began his flesh to tear :
Then dying thus he wail'd his fate :
' Unhappy me ! and wise too late !
How useful what I did disdain !
How grievous that which made me vain !'

THE FOX AND THE CROW.

From the same, and by the same translator.

HIS folly in repentance ends,
Who to a flatt'ring knave attends.
A Crow, her hunger to appease,
Had from a window stolen some cheese,
And sitting on a lofty pine
In state, was just about to dine.
This, when a Fox observed below,
He thus harangued the foolish Crow :
' Lady, how beauteous to the view
Those glossy plumes of sable hue !
Thy features how divinely fair !
With what a shape, and what an air !
Could you but frame your voice to sing,
You'd have no rival on the wing.'
But she, now willing to display
Her talents in the vocal way,
Let go the cheese of luscious taste,
Which reynard seized with greedy haste.
The grudging dupe now sees at last
That for her folly she must fast.

THE FABLE OF DRYOPE.

From the Latin of Ovid.Translated by A. Pope.*

No nymph of all Oechalia could compare
For beauteous form with Dryope the fair,
Her tender mother's only hope and pride
(Myself the offspring of a second bride.)
This nymph compress'd by him who rules the day,
Whom Delphi and the Delian isle obey,
Andræmon lov'd ; and bless'd in all those charms
That pleas'd a god, succeeded to her arms.

A lake there was, with shelving banks around,
Whose verdant summit fragrant myrtles crown'd.
These shades, unknowing of the fates, she sought,
And to the Naiads flowery garlands brought ;

* Born 43 years before Christ—died at the age of 60.

Her smiling babe (a pleasing charge) she prest
Within her arms, and nourish'd at her breast.
Not distant far, a watery Lotos grows ;
The spring was new, and all the verdant boughs
Adorn'd with blossoms, promis'd fruits that vie.
In glowing colours with the Tyrian dye :
Of these she cropp'd to please her infant son ;
And I myself the same rash act had done,
But lo ! I saw (as near her side I stood)
The violated blossoms drop with blood.
Upon the tree I cast a frightful look ;
The trembling tree with sudden horror shook.
Lotis the nymph (if rural tales be true),
As from Priapus' lawless lust she flew,
Forsook her form ; and fixing here became
A flowery plant, which still preserves her name.

This change unknown, astonish'd at the sight,
My trembling sister strove to urge her flight,
And first the pardon of the nymphs implor'd,
And those offended sylvan powers ador'd :
But when she backward would have fled, she found
Her stiffening feet were rooted in the ground :
In vain to free her fasten'd feet she strove,
And as she struggles, only moves above ;
She feels th' encroaching bark around her grow
By quick degrees, and cover all below :
Surpris'd at this, her trembling hand she heaves
To rend her hair ; her hand is fill'd with leaves :
Where late was hair, the shooting leaves are seen
To rise and shade her with a sudden green.
The child Amphissus, to her bosom press'd,
Perceiv'd a colder and a harder breast,
And found the springs, that ne'er till then deny'd
Their milky moisture, on a sudden dry'd.
I saw, unhappy ! what I now relate,
And stood the helpless witness of thy fate ;
Embrac'd thy boughs, thy rising bark delay'd,
There wish'd to grow, and mingle shade with shade.

Behold Andræmon and th' unhappy sire
Appear and for their Dryope inquire ;
A springing tree for Dryope they find,
And print warm kisses on the panting rind ;
Prostrate, with tears their kindred plant bedew,
And close embrace as to the roots they grew.
The face was all that now remain'd of thee,
No more a woman, nor yet quite a tree ;
Thy branches hung with humid pearls appear,
From every leaf distils a trickling tear,
And strait a voice, while yet a voice remains,
Thus through the trenibling boughs in sighs complains :

If to the wretched any faith be given,
I swear by all th' unpyting powers of heaven,
No wilful crime this heavy vengeance bred ;
In mutual innocence our lives we led :
If this be false, let these new greens decay,
Let sounding axes lop my limbs away,
And crackling flames on all my honours prey !
But from my branching arms this infant bear,
Let some kind nurse supply a mother's care :
And to his mother let him oft be led,
Sport in her shades, and in her shades be fed ;
Teach him, when first his infant voice shall frame
Imperfect words, and lisp his mother's name,

To hail this tree ; and say, with weeping eyes,
 Within this plant my hapless parent lies :
 And when in youth he seeks the shady woods,
 Oh, let him fly the crystal lakes and floods,
 Nor touch the fatal flowers ; but, warn'd by me,
 Believe a goddess shrin'd in every tree.
 My sire, my sister, and my spouse, farewell !
 If in your breasts, or love or pity dwell,
 Protect your plant, nor let my branches feel
 The browsing cattle, or the piercing steel.
 Farewell ! and since I cannot bend to join
 My lips to yours, advance at least to mine.
 My son, thy mother's parting kiss receive,
 While yet thy mother has a kiss to give.
 I can no more : the creeping mild invades
 My closing lips, and hides my head in shades :
 Remove your hands ; the bark shall soon suffice
 Without their aid to seal these dying eyes.
 She ceas'd at once to speak, and ceas'd to be ;
 And all the nymph was lost within the tree ;
 Yet latent life through her new branches reign'd,
 And long the plant a human heat retain'd.

THE SACRED GROVE.

From the Latin of Lucan.*

Translated by Nicolas Rowe.

Not far away for ages past had stood
 An old inviolated sacred wood ;
 Whose gloomy boughs, thick interwoven, made
 A chilly cheerless everlasting shade :
 There, nor the rustic gods, nor satyrs sport,
 Nor fauns and sylviæ with the nymphs resort ;
 But barbarous priests some dreadful pow'r adore,
 And lustrate every tree with human gore.
 If mysteries in times of old receiv'd,
 And pious austerities be yet believ'd,
 There not the feather'd serps or birds her nest,
 Nor lonely dens conceal the savage beast :
 There no tempestuous winds presume to fly,
 Even lightnings glance about, and shoot obliquely by.
 No wanton breezes toss the dancing leaves,
 But shivering horror in the branches heaves.
 Black springs with pitchy streams divide the ground,
 And bubbling tumble with a sullen sound.
 Old images of forms misshapen stand,
 Rude and unknowing of the artist's hand ;
 With hoary filth begrin'd, each ghastly head
 Strikes the astonish'd gazer's soul with dread.
 No gods, who long in common shapes appear'd,
 Were e'er with such religious awe rever'd :
 But zealous crowds in ignorance adore,
 And still the less they know, they fear the more.
 Oft (as Fæne tells) the earth in sounds of woe
 Is heard to groan from hollow depths below ;
 The baleful yew, though dead, has oft been seen
 To rise from earth, and spring with dusky green ;

With sparkling flames the trees unburning shine,
 And round their boles prodigious serpents twine.
 The pious worshippers approach not near,
 But shun their gods, and kneel with distant fear :
 The priest himself, when, or the day, or night,
 Rolling have reach'd their full meridian height,
 Retrains the gloomy paths with wary feet,
 Dreading the demon of the grove to meet ;
 Who, terrible to sight, at that fix'd hour,
 Still treads the round about his dreary bower.

This wood near neighb'ring to th' encompass'd
 town
 Untouch'd by former wars remain'd alone ;
 And since the country round it naked stands,
 From hence the Latian chief supplies demands.
 But lo ! the bolder hands, that should have struck,
 With some unusual horror trembling shook :
 With silent dread and reverence they survey'd
 The gloom majestic of the sacred shade :
 None dares with impious steel the bark to rend,
 Lest on himself the destin'd stroke descend.
 Cæsar perceiv'd the spreading fear to grow,
 Then eager, caught an axe, and aim'd a blow.
 Deep sunk within a violated oak
 The wounding edge, and thus the warrior spoke :
 " Now let no doubting hand the task decline ;
 Cut you the wood, and let the guilt be mine."
 The trembling bands unavailingly obey'd ;
 Two various ills were in the balance laid,
 And Cæsar's wrath against the gods was weigh'd.
 Then Jove's Dodonian tree was forc'd to bow ;
 The lofty ash and knotty holm lay low ;
 The floating alder by the current born,
 The cypress by the noble mourner worn,
 Veil their aerial summits, and display
 Their dark recesses to the golden day :
 Crowding they fall, each o'er the other lies,
 And heap'd on high the leafy piles arise.
 With grief, and fear, the groaning Gauls beheld
 Their holy grove by impious soldiers fell'd ;
 While the Massilians, from th' encompass'd wall,
 Rejoic'd to see the sylvan honours fall.
 They hope such power can never prosper long,
 Nor think the patient gods will bear the wrong.
 But, ah ! too oft success to guilt is given,
 And wretches only stand the mark of Heaven,
 With timber largely from the wood supply'd.
 For wans the legions search the country wide ;
 Then from the crooked plough yoke the steer,
 And leave the sown to mourn the fruitless year.

THE TEMPLE OF JUPITER AMMON.

From the same, and by the same translator.

Now to the sacred temple they draw near,
 Whose only altars Libyan lands revere ;
 There but unlike the Jove by Rome ador'd.
 A form uncouth, stands Heaven's almighty lord.
 No regal ensigns grace his potent hand,
 Nor shakes he there the lightning's flaming brand :
 But, ruder to behold, a horned ram
 Belies the god, and Ammon is his name.

* A Roman Poet born at Corduba, in Spain about A. D. 38. He went to Rome when a child. He died at the age of 27.

There though he reigns unrivall'd and alone,
 O'er the rich neighbours of the torrid zone ;
 Though swarthy Æthiops are to him confin'd,
 With Araby the blest, and wealthy Inde ;
 Yet no proud domes are rais'd, no gems are seen,
 To blaze upon his shrines with costly sheen ;
 But plain and poor, and unprophan'd he stood,
 Such as, to whom our great forefathers bow'd :
 A god of pious times, and days of old,
 That keeps his temples safe from Roman gold.
 Here and here only, through wide Libya's space,
 Tall trees, the land, and verdant herbage grace ;
 Here the loose sands by plenteous springs are bound,

Knit to a mass, and moulded into ground :
 Here smiling Nature wears a fertile dress,
 And all things here the present god confess.
 Yet here the Sun to neither pole declines,
 But from his zenith vertically shines :
 Hence, e'en the trees no friendly shelter yield,
 Scarce their own trunks the leafy branches shield ;
 The rays descend direct, all round embrace,
 And to a central point the shadow chase.
 Here equally the middle line is found,
 To cut the radiant Zodiac in its round :
 Here unoblique the Bull and Scorpion rise,
 Nor mount too swift, nor leave too soon the skies ;
 Nor Libra does too long the Ram attend,
 Nor bids the Maid the fishy sign descend.
 The Boys and Centaur justly time divide,
 And equally their several seasons guide :
 Alike the Crab and wintery Goat return,
 Alike the Lion and the flowing Urn.
 If any farther nations yet are known,
 Beyond the Libyan fires, and scorching zone ;
 Northward from them the Sun's bright course is made,

And to the southward strikes the leaning shade :
 There slow Bootes, with his lazy wain
 Descending, seems, to reach the watery main.
 Of all the lights which high above they see,
 No star whate'er from Neptune's waves is free,
 The whirling axle drives them round, and plunges in the sea.

Before the temple's entrance, at the gate,
 Attending crowds of eastern pilgrims wait :
 These from the horned god expect relief :
 But all give way before the Latian chief.
 His host, (as crowds are superstitious still)
 Curious of fate, of future good and ill,
 And foud to prove prophetic Ammon's skill,
 Entreat their leader to the god would go,
 And from his oracle Rome's fortunes know :
 But Labienus chief the thought approv'd,
 And thus the common suit to Cato mov'd :

"Chance, and the fortune of the way," he said,
 "Have brought Jove's sacred counsels to our aid :
 This greatest of the gods, this mighty chief,
 In each distress shall be a sure relief ;
 Shall point the distant dangers from afar,
 And teach the future fortunes of the war.
 To thee, O Cato ! pious ! wise ! and just !
 Their dark decrees the cautious gods shall trust !
 • To thee their fore-determin'd will shall tell :

Their will has been thy law, and thou hast kept it
 well.

Fate bids thee now the noble thought improve ;
 Fate brings thee here, to meet and talk with Jove.
 Inquire betimes, what various chance shall come
 To impious Caesar, and thy native Rome ;
 Try to avert, at least, thy country's doom.
 Ask if these arms our freedom shall restore :
 Or else, if laws and right shall be no more.
 Be thy great breast with sacred knowledge fraught,
 To lead us in the wandering maze of thought :
 Thou, that to virtue ever wert inclin'd,
 Learn what it is, how certainly defin'd,
 And leave some perfect rule to guide mankind."

Full of the god that dwelt within his breast,
 The hero thus his secret mind express'd,
 And in-born truths reveal'd ; truths which might well

Become e'en oracles themselves to tell.

"Where would thy fond, thy vain inquiry go ?
 What mystic fate, what secret would'st thou know ?
 Is it a doubt if death should be my doom,
 Rather than live till kings and bondage come,
 Rather than see a tyrant crown'd in Rome ?
 Or would'st thou know if, what we value here,
 Life, be a trifle hardly worth our care ?
 What by old age and length of days we gain,
 More than to lengthen out the sense of pain ?
 Or if this world, with all its forces join'd,
 The universal malice of mankind,
 Can shake or hurt the brave and honest mind ?
 If stable virtue can her ground maintain,
 Whilst fortune feebly threatens and throws in vain ?
 If truth and justice with uprightness dwell,
 And honesty consist in meaning well ?
 If right be independent of success,
 And conquest cannot make it more nor less ?
 Aie these, my friend, the secrets thou would'st
 know,

Those doubts for which to oracles we go ?
 'Tis known, 'tis plain, 'tis all already told,
 And horned Ammon can no more unfold.
 From God don't, to God by nature join'd,
 We act the dictates of his mighty mind :
 And though our priests are mute, and temples still,
 God never wants a voice to speak his will.
 When first we from the teeming womb were brought,
 With in-born precepts then our souls were fraught,
 And then the Maker his new creatures taught.
 Then when he form'd, and gave us to be men,
 He gave us all our useful knowledge then.
 Canst thou believe, the vast Eternal Mind
 Was e'er to Syrts and Libyan sands confin'd ?
 That he would choose this waste, this barren ground,
 To teach the thin inhabitants around,
 And leave his truth in wilds and deserts drown'd ?
 Is there a place that God would choose to love
 Beyond this earth, the seas, yon Heaven above,
 And virtuous minds, the noblest throne for Jove ?
 Why seek we farther then ? Behold around,
 How all thou seest does with the God abound,
 Jove is alike in all, and always to be found.
 Let those weak minds, who live in doubt and fear,
 To juggling priests for oracles repair ;

One certain hour of death to each decreed,
My fix'd, my certain soul from doubt has freed.
The coward and the brave are doom'd to fall;
And when Jove told this truth, he told us all."
So spoke the hero; and, to keep his word,
Nor Ammon, nor his oracle explor'd;
But left the crowd at freedom to believe,
And take such answers as the priest should give.

IMITATIVE HARMONY.

*From the Latin of Virg.

Translated by Christopher Pitt.

ATTEND, young bard, and listen while I sing;
Lo! I unlock the muses' sacred spring;
Lo! Phœbus calls thee to his inmost shrine;
Hark! in one common voice, the tuneful nine
Invite and court thee to the rites divine.
When first to man the privilege was given,
To hold by verse an intercourse with heaven,
Unwilling that th' immortal art should lie
Cheap and expos'd to every vulgar eye,
Great Jove, to drive away the groveling crowd,
To narrow bounds confin'd the glorious road,
Which more exalted spirits may pursue,
And left it open to the sacred few.
For many a painful task, in every part,
Claims all the poet's vigilance and art.
'Tis not enough his verses to complete,
In measure, numbers, or discern'd feet;
Or render things, by clear expression bright,
And set each object in a proper light:
To all, proportion'd terms he must dispense,
And make the sound a picture of the sense:
The correspondent words exactly frame,
The look, the features, and the men the same.
His thoughts the bard must suitably express,
Each in a different face and different dress;
Lest in unvary'd looks the crowd be shown,
And the whole multitude appear as one.
With rapid feet and wings, without delay,
This swiftly flies, and smoothly skims away:
That, vast of size, his limbs, huge, broad, and strong,
Moves ponderous, and scarce drags his bulk along,
This blooms with youth and beauty in his face,
And Venus, breathes on every limb a grace:
That, of rude form, his uncouth numbers shows,
Looks horrible, and frowns with his rough brows,
His monstrous tail in many a fold and wind,
Voluminous and vast, curls up behind:
At once the image and the lines appear
Rude to the eye, and frightful to the ear.
Nor are those figures given without a cause,
But fixt and settled by determin'd laws;
All claim and wear, as their deserts are known,
A voice, a face, and habit of their own.
Lo! when the sailors steer the ponderous ships,
And plough, with brazen beaks, the foamy deeps,
Incumbent on the main that roars around;

Beneath their labouring oars the waves resound,
The prow wide-echoing through the dark profound:
To the loud call each distant rock replies,
Tost by the storm the frothy surges rise;
While the hoarse ocean beats the sounding shore,
Dash'd from the strand, the flying waters roar.
Flash at the shock, and gathering in an heap,
The liquid mountains rise, and overhang the deep.
See through her shores Trinacra's realms rebound,
Starting and trembling at the bellowing sound;
High-towering o'er the waves the mountains ride,
And clash with floating mountains on the tide.
But when blue Neptune from his car surveys,
And calms at one regard the raging seas:
Stretch'd like a peaceful lake the deep subsides,
And o'er the level light the valley glides.
The poet's art and conduct we admire,
When angry Vulcan rolls a flood of fire;
When on the groves and fields the deluge preys,
And wraps the crackling stubble in the blaze.
Nor less our pleasure, when the flame divides,
And climbs aspiring round the cauldron's sides;
From the dark bottom work the waters up,
Swell, boil, and hiss, and bubble to the top.
Thus in smooth lines, smooth subjects we rehearse,
But the rough rock roars in as rough a verse,
If gay the subject, gay must be the song;
And the brisk numbers quickly glide along:
When the fields flourish; or the skies unfold
Swift from the flying hinge their gates of gold.
If sad the theme, then each grave line moves slow,
The mournful numbers languishingly flow,
And drag, and labour, with a weight of woe:
If e'er the boding bird, of night, who mourns
O'er ruins, desolation, graves, and urns,
With piercing screams the darkness should invade,
And break the silence of the dismal shade.
When things are small, the terms should still be so;
For low words please us, when the theme is low.
But when some giant, horrible and grim,
Enormous in his gait, and vast in every limb,
Stalks towering on; the swelling words must rise
In just proportion to the monster's size.
If some large weight his huge arms strive to shove,
The verse too labours; the throng'd words scarce
move.
When each stiff clod beneath the ponderous plough,
Crumbles and breaks; th' encumber'd lines march
slow,
Nor less, when pilots catch the friendly gales,
Unfurl their surounds, and hoist the wide-stretch'd sails.
But if the poem suffers from delay,
Let the lines fly precipitate away;—
And when the viper issues from the brake;
Be quick; with stones, and brands, and fire, attack
His rising crest, and drive the serpent back.
When night descends; or, stunn'd by numerous strokes,
And groaning, to the earth drops the vast ox;
The line too sinks with correspondent sound,
Flat with the steer, and headlong to the ground.
When the wild waves subside, and tempests cease,
And hush their roarings and their rage to peace;

* A modern Latin Poet, born 1490 at Cremona. Died at Alba 1566.

So oft we see the interrupted strain
 Stopp'd in the midst,—and with the silent main,
 Pause for a space—at last it glides again.
 When Priam strains his aged arm, to throw
 His unavailing javelin at the foe;
 (His blood congeal'd, and every nerve unstrung,)
 Then with the theme compiles the artful song;
 Like him the solitary numbers flow
 Weak, trembling, melancholy, stiff, and slow.
 Not so young Pyrrhus, who with rapid force
 Beats down embattled armies in his course;
 The raging youth on trembling Ilion falls,
 Bursts her strong gates, and shakes her lofty walls;
 Provokes his flying courser to his speed,
 In full career to charge the warlike steed;
 He piles the field with mountains of the slain;
 He pours, he storms, he thunders through the plain

FRANCESCA'S ACCOUNT OF HER LOVE.

*From the Italian of Dante.

Translated by H. F. Carey.

As doves
 By fond desire invited, on wide wings
 And firm, to their sweet nest returning home,
 Cleave the air, wafted by their will along;
 They came——
 Then, turning, I to them my speech addressed,
 And thus began—"Francesca! your sad fate
 Even to tears my grief and pity moves.
 But tell me, in the time of your sweet sighs,
 By what and how Love granted that ye knew
 Your yet uncertain wishes?" She replied:
 "No greater grief than to remember days
 Of joy, when misery is at hand. That knows
 Thy learned instructor. Yet so eagerly
 If thou art bent to learn the primal root
 From whence our love got being, I will do,
 As one, who weeps and tells his tale. One day
 For our delight we read of Lancelot,
 How him Love thrall'd. Alone we were, and no
 Suspicion near us. Ofttimes by that reading
 Our eyes were drawn together, and the hue
 Fled from our altered cheeks. But at one point
 Alone, we fell. When of that smile we read,
 The wish'd-for smile, so rapturously kissed
 By one so deep in love, then he, who ne'er
 From me shall separate at once my lips
 All trembling kissed. The book and writer both
 Were I ove's purveyors. In its leaves that day
 We read no more."

UGOLINO.

From the same.

Translated by Ichabod Charles Wright.

[Ugolino is seen in the infernal regions gnawing the hairy scalp of his enemy who in this world had confined him and his children in a prison, and left them to die of famine. Ugolino relates his sufferings.]

"WHEN I awoke, ere morn its rays had shed,
 I heard my sons, who with me were confined,
 Sob in their slumbers, and cry out for bread.
 Full cruel art thou, if thou canst conceive,

* Dante was born at Florence 1265.—Died 1321.

Without a tear, what then came o'er my mind!
 And if thou grieve not, what can make thee grieve?
 They were awake; and now the hour drew near,
 Which had been wont to bring their scant repast.
 And each was pondering o'er his dream of fear.—
 When from within the dreadful tower I heard
 The entrance underneath with nails made fast:—
 I gazed upon my boys—nor spake a word.
 I wept not, for my heart was turn'd to stone;—
 My children wept;—and little Anselm cried,
 'What ails thee, father?—strange thy looks are grown.'

Yet still I wept not—still made no reply
 Throughout that day, and all the night beside;
 Until another sun lit up the sky.
 But, when a faint and broken ray was thrown
 Within that dismal dungeon, and I view'd
 In their four looks the image of my own,—
 Then both my hands through anguish did I bite;
 And they, supposing that from want of food
 I did so—sudden raised themselves upright,
 And said, 'O father! less will be our pain,
 If thou wilt feed on us:—thou did'st bestow
 This wretched flesh:—'tis thine to take again.'
 Then was I calm, lest they the more should grieve.
 Two days all silent we remain'd!—O thou
 Hard earth, why did'st thou not beneath us cleave?
 Four days our agonies had been delay'd,
 When Gaddo at my feet his body threw,
 Exclaiming,—'Father! why not give me aid?'
 He died;—and, as distinct as here I stand,
 I saw the three fall one by one, before
 The sixth day closed;—then, groping with my hand,
 I felt each wretched corpse, for sight had fail'd;
 Two days I call'd on those who were no more;
 Then hunger—stronger—'e'en than grief—prevail'd.
 This said—aside his vengeful eyes were thrown,
 And with his teeth the skull again he tore,
 Fierce as a dog to gnaw the very bone.

SONNET.

From the Italian of Dante.

Translated by Rev. C. Strong.

SAY, pilgrims, ye that onward journey slow,
 Musing, perchance, on things remote and dear,
 From such far distant people come ye here,
 As from your outward guise ye seem to show?

Why through the mourning city straightway go,
 Your cheeks unmoistened with a single tear,
 All heedless of her sorrow ye appear,
 Like those who never heard her tale of woe.

If ye but stay with wish to hear it told,
 The sighs that rend my breast assure me this,
 That ye would sorely weep ere ye withdrew;

She hath for ever lost her Beatrice—
 And the discourse that one of her might hold,
 Would even strangers' eyes with tears bedew.

SONNET.

From the Italian of Petrarch.Translated by Archdeacon Wingham.*

CREATURES there are i'th' world, of glance so bold,
That not day's broadest glare offends their sight ;
While others, dazzled with excess of light,
Venture not forth till evening's bell is toll'd :

And some, by veriest foolishness cajoled,
Rush to the gorgeous flame on pinion slight,
And find its tempting lustre not as bright—
With these, alas ! 'tis mine to the enroll'd !

Too weak to bear that beauty's fatal blaze,
To seek retirement's solitary shade
Unknowing, and the silent hours of gloom ;

With tearful eye, by destiny betray'd,
Backward I turn in purblind awe to gaze—
Turn, ah ! too well I feel, to meet my glittering doom.

SONNET.

From the same, and by the same translator.

A THOUSAND thousand times, my lovely foe,
To purchase peace from your triumphant eyes,
To you my heart I've tender'd : you despise
The humble boon, nor deign to look so low.

And if love's flames for me in others glow,
Still is it dears to court a hopeless prize :
Nor can it, since to you it worthless has,
E'er in this breast its ancient station know.

Thus by its master chased, by you denied
Soft solace in its exile, doom'd to hate
Others' society, its own abhorr'd,

Haply it may provoke untimely fate :
Where heavy were the guilt on either side ;
But heaven, Lady, yours, as more you are adored.

SONNET.

Love does not die with the beauty which first excited it.From the same.Translated by Lieut. R. Macgregor.

[A friend of Petrarch, disappointed in the personal appearance of Laura, is said to have observed, that her beauty neither deserved such high encomium nor such great love : the poet is supposed to have replied in the above sonnet, which paints her, in the bloom of youth, as she appeared during their early acquaintance.]

UPON the light breeze flow'd her golden hair,
In many a mazy ringlet wildly blown,
And in bright lustre from her fine eyes shone
The witching glances which are now so rare ;

And, true or false, methought, she seem'd to wear
Soft Pity's ensign o'er her fair cheek thrown ;
What marvel then than that I, whose breast was sown
With Love's quick seed, such crop so soon should bear.

* Born 1304.—Died 1374.

Not mortal seem'd her step the green sward on ;
Her form angelic ; and, in each sweet word
Which from her fell, no human voice was heard.
A spirit heavenly, a living sun
Was what I saw ; if such not still are found
Now to unbend the bow will never heal the wound.

SONNET.

From the same, and by the same translator.

WHERE is that face whose slightest look could wind
My fond heart where it would, now here, now there ?
Where the twin stars which, from that forehead fair
Shone on my life's dim course with influence kind ?
Where is that talent, prudence, virtue join'd ?
That courteous, clear, mild, modest eloquence,
where ?

And where, all met in her, the graces rare
Which so long ruled at will my captive mind ?
Where is the gentle shade of that sweet mien,
Which calm'd at once my aching spirit's strife,
And smooth'd my brow, where every thought was seen ?

Ah ! where is she who held in hand my life ?
How great the loss, O wretched world, to thee !
Mine too how great, whose tears must ceaseless be !

SONNET.

From the same.Translated by Lady Dacre.

A TENDER paleness stealing o'er her cheek
Veil'd her sweet smile as 'twere a passing cloud,
And such pure dignity of love avow'd
That in my eyes my full soul strove to speak :

Then knew I how the spirits of the blest
Communion hold in heaven ; so beam'd serene
That pitying thought, by every eye unseen
Save mine, wont ever on her charms to rest.

Each grace angelic, each meek glance humane,
That Love e'er to his fairest votaries lent,
By this were deem'd ungentle cold disdain !

Her lovely looks with sadness downward bent,
In silence to my fury seem'd to say,
Who calls my faithful friend so far away ?

SONNET.

From the same, and by the same translator.

IF faith most true, a heart that cannot feign,
If love's sweet languishment and chasten'd thought,
And wishes pure by nobler feelings taught,
If in a labyrinth wanderings long and vain,

If on the brow each pang pourtray'd to bear,
Or from the heart low broken sounds to draw,
Withheld by shame, or check'd by pious awe,
If on the faded cheek love's hue to wear,

If than myself to hold one far more dear,
If sighs that cease not, tears that ever flow,
Wrung from the heart by all love's various woe,
In absence if consumed, and chill'd when near,
If these be ills in which I waste my prime,
Though I the sufferer be, yours, lady, is the crime.

CANZONE.

From the same, and by the same translator.

Y^E waters clear and fresh, to whose bright wave
 She all her beauties gave,—
 Sole of her sex in my impassion'd mind !
 Thou sacred branch so graced,
 (With sighs e'en now retraced !)
 On whose smooth shaft her heavenly form reclined !
 Herbage and flowers that bent the robe beneath,
 Whose graceful folds comprest
 Her pure angelic breast !
 Ye airs serene that breathe
 Where Love first taught me in her eyes his lore !
 Yet once more all attest,
 The last sad plaintive lay my woe-worn heart may pour !

If so I must my destiny fulfil,
 And Love to close these weeping eyes be doom'd
 By Heaven's mysterious will,
 Oh ! grant that in this loved retreat, entomb'd,
 My poor remains may lie,
 And my freed soul regain its native sky !
 Less rude shall Death appear,
 If yet a hope so dear
 Smooth the dread passage to eternity !
 No shade so calm—serene,
 My weary spirit finds on earth below ;
 No grave so still—so green,
 In which my o'ertail'd frame may rest from mortal
 woe !

Yet one day, haply, she—so heavenly fair !
 So kind in cruelty !—
 With careless steps may to these haunts repair,
 And where her beaming eye
 Met mine in days so blest,
 A wistful glance may yet unconscious rest,
 And seeking me around,
 May mark among the stones a lowly mound,
 That speaks of pity to the shuddering sense !
 Then may she breathe a sigh,
 Of power to win me mercy from above !
 Doing Heaven violence,
 All-beautiful in tears of late relenting love !

Still dear to memory ! when, in odorous showers,
 Scattering their balmy flowers,
 To summer airs th' o'ershadowing branches bow'd,
 The while, with humble state,
 In all the pomp of tribute sweets she sate,
 Wrapt in the roseate cloud !
 Now clustering blossoms deck her vesture's hem,
 Now her bright tresses gem,—
 (In that all-blissful day,
 Like burnish'd gold with orient pearls inwrought,)
 Some strew the turf—some on the waters float !
 Some, fluttering, seem to say
 In wanton circlets tost, " Here Love holds sovereign
 sway !"

Of I exclaim'd, in awful tremor rapt,
 " Surely of heavenly birth
 This gracious form that visits the low earth !"
 So in oblivion lap

Was reason's power, by the celestial mein,
 The brow,—the accents mild—
 The angelic smile serene !
 That now all sense of sad reality
 O'erborne by transport wild, —
 " Alas ! how came I here, and when ?" I cry,—
 Deeming my spirit past into the sky !
 E'en though the illusion cease
 In these dear haunts alone, my tortured heart finds peace.

If thou wert graced with numbers sweet, my song !
 To match thy wish to please ;
 Leaving these rocks and trees,
 Thou boldly might'st go forth, and dare th' assembled throng.

SONNET.

From the same, and by the same translator.

TH^Y eyes, the face, the limbs of heavenly mould,
 So long the theme of my impassion'd lay,
 Charms which so stole me from myself away,
 That strange to other men the course I hold :
 The crisped locks of pure and lucid gold,
 The lighting of the angelic smile, whose ray
 To earth could all of Paradise convey,
 A hute dust are now !—to feeling cold !
 And yet I live !—but that I live bewail,
 Sunk the loved light that through the tempest led
 My shatter'd bark, bereft of mast and sail :
 Hush'd be the song that breathed love's purest fire !
 Lost is the theme on which my fancy fed,
 And turned to mourning my once tuneful lyre.

SONNET.

From the same, and by the same translator.

Nor skies serene, with glittering stars inlaid,
 Nor gallant ships o'er tranquil ocean dancing,
 Nor gay careering knights in arms advancing,
 Nor wild herds bounding through the forest glade,
 Nor tidings new of happiness delay'd,
 Nor poete, Love's witchery enhancing,
 Nor lady's song beside clear fountain glancing,

In beauty's pride, with chastity array'd ;
 Nor aught of lovely, aught of gay in show,
 Shall touch my heart, now cold within her tomb
 Who was erewhile my life and light below !
 So heavy—tedious—sad—my days unblest,
 That I, with strong desire, invoke Death's gloom,
 Her to behold, whom ne'er to have seen were best.

SONNET.

From the Italian of Lorenzo de Medici.*

Translated by the Rev. C. Strong.

ORT on the recollection sweet I dwell,
 Yea, never from my mind can aught efface
 The dress my mistress wore, the time, the place,
 Where first she fixed my eyes in rapture's spell.

* Died 1492.

How she then looked, thou, Love, rememberest well,
For thou her side hast never ceased to grace,
Her gentle air, her meek, angelic face
The power of language and of thought excel.

As o'er the mountain peaks deep-clad in snow
Apollo pours a flood of golden light,
So down her snowy vesture streamed her hair :

The time and place how vain it were to show !
It must be day where shines a sun so bright,
And paradise where dwells a form so fair.

SONNET.

From the Italian of Matteo Maria Boiardo.*

Translated by the Rev. C. Strong.

Who never on that face has gazed awhile,
The world's sole light that dims the day-star's beam,
Those features bright with intellectual gleam,
That manner so distinct from mortal style ;

Who never saw the bloom of that sweet smile,
Where violets with the rose fresh-budding scum,
Nor listened to her lips' angelic theme,
Sounds th' it with dreams of heaven the sense beguile !

Who never felt that look address his soul,
Whose glance, as lightning sped, awakes the glow
Of kindling passion in the gazer's heart ;

Who never saw the motion soft and slow
Of those dark eyes as they in splendour roll,
Hath yet to learn Love's power, and feel his smart.

MADNESS OF ORLANDO.

From the Italian of Ariosto†.

Translated by John Hoole.

He reach'd a stream that through a meadow led,
Whose vivid turf an emerald carpet spread,
Spangled with flowers of many a dazzling hue,
Where numerous trees in beauteous order grew,
Whose shadowy branches gave a kind retreat
To flocks and naked swains from mid-day heat.
With ponderous cuirass, shield, and helm, oppress'd,
Orlando soon the welcome gales confess'd ;
And entering here to seek a short repose,
In evil chance a dreadful seat he chose ;
A seat, where every hope must fade away
On that unhappy, that detested day.

There, casting round a casual glance, he view'd
Full many a tree, that trembled o'er the flood,
Inscrib'd with words, in which, as near he drew,
The hand of his Angelica he knew.

This place was one, of many a mead and bower,
For which Medoro, at the sultry hour,
Oft left the shepherd's cot, by love inspir'd,
And with Cathay's unrivall'd queen retir'd.
Angelica and her Medoro twin'd,
In amorous posies on the sylvan rind.

He sees, while every letter proves a dart,
Which love infixes in his bleeding heart.
Fain would he by a thousand ways deceive
His cruel thoughts, fain would he not believe
What yet he must—then hopes some other fair
The name of his Angelica may bear.

" But, ah ! " he cried, " too surely can I tell
These characters oft seen and known so well—
Yet should this fiction but conceal her love,
Medoro then may blest Orlando prove."

Thus, self-deceiv'd, forlorn Orlando strays
Still far from truth, still wanders in the maze
Of doubts and fears, while in his breast he tries
To feed that hope his better sense denies.
So the poor bird, that from the fields of air
Lights in the fraudulent gin or viscous snare,
The more he flutters, and the subtle wiles
Attempt, to 'scape, the faster makes the toils.

Now came Orlando where the pendent hill,
Curv'd in an arch, o'er-hung the limpid rill :
Around the cavern's mouth were seen to twine
The creeping ivy and the curling vine.
Oft here the happy pair were wont to waste
The noontide heats, embracing and embrac'd ;
And chiefly here, inscrib'd or carv'd, their names
Innumerable witness'd to their growing flames.
Alighting here, the warrior pensive stood,
And at the grotto's rustic entrance view'd
Words, by the hand of young Medoro wrought ;
And fresh they seem'd, as when his amorous thought
For bliss enjoy'd his grateful thanks express'd,
And first in tuneful verse his passion dress'd.
Such in his native tongue might sure excel,
And thus, in ours transfus'd, the sense I tell.

" Hail ! lovely plants, clear streams, and meadows
green ;
And thou, dear cave, whose cool-solace'd scene
No sun molest ! where she, of royal strain,
Angelica, by numbers woo'd in vain,
Daughter of Galaphron, with heavenly charms
Was oft enfolded in these happy arms !
O ! let me, poor Medoro, thus repay
Such boundless rapture ; thus with every lay
Of grateful praise the tender bosom move,
Lords, knights, and dames, that know the sweets of
love :

Each traveller, or hind of low degree,
Whom chance or fortune leads the place to see ;
Till all shall cry—" Thou Sun ! thou Moon, attend !
This fountain, grotto, mead, and shade defend !
Guard them, ye choir of nymphs ! not let the swain
With flocks or herds the sacred haunts profane ! " "

These verses, in Arabian written, drew
The knight's attention, who their idiom knew.
To him full well was many a language known,
But chiefly this, familiar to his own :
Such knowledge sav'd him oft, in distant lands,
From wrong and shame amid the Pagan bands.
But, ah ! no more th' advantage shall he boast,
That in one fatal hour so dearly cost !
Three times he reads, as oft he reads again
The cruel lines ; as oft he strives, in vain,
To give each sense the lie, and fondly tries
To disbelieve the witness of his eyes ;

* Author of the "Orlando Innamorato." Born 1434.—Died 1494.

† Born 1474.—Died 1533.

While at each word he feels the jealous smart,
And sudden coldness freezing at his heart.
Fix'd on the stone, in stiffening gaze, that prov'd
His secret pangs, he stood with looks unmov'd,
A seeming statue ! while the godlike light
Of reason nearly seem'd eclips'd in night.
Confide in him, who by experience knows,
This is the woe surpassing other woes !
From his sad brow the wonted cheer is fled,
Low on his breast declines his drooping head ;
Nor can he find (while grief each sense o'erbears)
Voice for his complaints, or moisture for his tears.
Impatient sorrow seeks its way to force,
But with too eager haste retards the course.
As when a full-brimm'd vase, with ample waist
And slender entrance form'd, is downward plac'd,
And stands revers'd, the rushing waters pent,
All crowd at once to issue at the vent :
The narrow vent the struggling tide restrains,
And scarcely drop by drop the bubbling liquor drains.

He wishes—hopes—believes some foe might frame
A falsehood to defile his fair-one's name :
Or with dire malice, by the tainting breath
Of jealous rage, to work his certain death.
Yet he, whose'er the foe, his skill had prov'd
In feigning well the characters belov'd.

When now the Sun had to his sister's reign
Resign'd the skies, Orlando mounts again
His Brighadaro's back, and soon espies
The curling smoke from neighbouring hamlets rise.
The herds are heard to low, the dogs to bay ;
And to the village now his lonely way
Orlando takes, there pale and languid leaves
His Brighadaro, where a youth receives
The generous courser ; while, with ready haste,
One from the champion has his mail unbrac'd :
One takes his spurs of gold ; and one from rust
His armour scours and cleanses from the dust.

Lo ! thus the roe, where, feeble with his wound,
Medoro lay, where wondrous chance he found.

No nourishment the warrior here desir'd,
On grief he fed, nor other food requir'd.
He sought to rest, but ah ! the more he sought,
New pangs were added to his troubled thought :
Where'er he turn'd his sight, he still descri'd
The hated words inscrib'd on every side.
He would have spoke, but held his peace in fear
To know the truth he dreaded most to hear.

The gentle swain, who mark'd his secret grief,
With cheerful speech, to give his pains relief,
Told all the adventure that the pair befel,
Which oft before his tongue was wont to tell
To every guest that gave a willing ear,
For many a guest was pleas'd the tale to hear.
He told how to his cot the virgin brought
Medoro wounded : how his cure she wrought,
While in her bosom Love's imprison'd dart
With deeper wound transfix'd her bleeding heart :
Hence, mindless of her birth, a princess bred,
Rich India's heir, she deign'd, by passion led,
A friendless youth of low estate to wed.
In witness of his tale, the peasant show'd
The bracelet by Angelica bestow'd,

Departing thence, her token of regard,
His hospitable welcome to reward.

This fatal proof, his well-known present, left
Of every gleam of hope his soul bereft ;
Love, that had tortur'd long his wretched thrall,
With this concluding stroke determin'd all.

At length, from every view retir'd apart,
He gives full vent to his o'erlabour'd heart ;
Now from his eyes the streaming shower releas'd,
Stains his pale cheek, and wanders down his breast ;
Deeply he groans, and, staggering with his woes,
On the lone bed his listless body throws.
But rests no more than if in wilds forlorn,
Stretch'd on the naked rock or pointed thorn.
While thus he lay, he sudden call'd to mind,
That on the couch, where then his limbs reclin'd,
His faithless mistress, and her paramour,
Had oft with love beguil'd the amorous hour.
Stung with the thought, the hated dawn he flies ;
Not swifter from the turf is seen to rise
The swain, who, courting grateful sleep, perceives
A serpent darting through the rustling leaves.
Each object now is loathsome to his sight :
The bed—the cot—the swain—he heeds no light
To guide his steps, not Dian's silver ray,
Nor cheerful dawn, the harbinger of day.
He takes his armour, and his steed he takes,
And through surrounding gloom impatient makes
His darkling way, there vents his woes alone,
In many a dreadful plaint and dreary groan.
Unceasing still he weeps, unceasing mourns ;
Alike to him the night, the day returns ;
Cities and towns he shuns ; in woods he lies,
His bed the earth, his canopy the skies.
He wonders oft what fountain can supply
His flood of grief ; how sigh succeeds to sigh.
“ These are not tears,” he cried, “ that ceaseless
flow ;

Far other signs are these that speak my woe.
Before the fire my vital moisture flies,
And now, exhaling, issues at my eyes :
Lo ! thus it streams, and thus shall ever spend,
Till with its course my life and sorrows end.
These are not sighs that thus my torments show ;
Sighs have a pause, but these no respite know.
Love burns my heart ! these are the gales he makes,
As round the flame his fanning wings he shakes.
How canst thou, wondrous Love ! surround with fire,
Yet, unconsum'd, preserve my heart entire ?
I am not he, the man my looks proclaim,
The man that lately bore Orlando's name ;
He, by his fair one's cruel falsehood, dies ;
And now, interr'd, her hapless victim lies.
I am his spirit freed from mortal chains,
Doom'd in this hell to rove with endless pains ;
A wretched warning here on earth to prove
For all henceforth who put their trust in love.”

Through the still night, the earl from shade to shade
Thus lonely rov'd, and when the day display'd
Its twilight gleam, chance to the fountain led
His wandering course, where first his fate he read
In fond Medoro's strains—the sight awakes
His torpid sense, each patient thought forsakes

His maddening breast, that rage and hatred breathes,
And from his side he swift the sword unsheaths.
He hews the rock, he makes the letters fly ;
The shatter'd fragments mount into the sky :
Hapless the cave whose stones, the trees whose rind,

Bear with Angelica Medoro join'd ;
From that curs'd day no longer to receive,
And flocks or swains with cooling shade relieve ;
While that fair fountain, late so silvery pure,
Remain'd as little from his arm secure :
Together boughs and earthen clods he drew,
Crag, stones, and trunks, and in the waters threw ;
Deep to its bed, with ooze and mud he spoil'd
The murmuring current, and its spring defil'd.
His limbs now moisten'd with a briny tide,
When strength no more his senseless wrath supplied,

Proned on the turf he sunk, unnerv'd and spent,
All motionless, his looks on Heav'n intent,
Stretch'd without food or sleep ; while thrice the
Sun

Had stay'd, and thrice his daily course had run.
The fourth dire morn, with frantic rage possess'd,
He rends the armour from his back and breast :
Here lies the helmet, there the bossy shield,
Cushes and cuirass further spread the field ;
And all his other arms at random strow'd,
In divers parts he scatters through the wood ;
Then from his body strips the covering vest,
And bares his smewy limbs and hairy chest ;
And now begins such feats of boundless rage,
As far and near th' astonish'd world engage.

His sword he left, else had his dreadful hand
With blood and horror fill'd each wasted land :
But little, pole-ax, sword, or mace he needs
To assist his strength, that every strength exceeds.
First his huge grasp a lofty pine uptears
Sheer by the roots, alike another fares
Of equal growth ; as easy round him strow'd,
As lowly weeds, or shrubs, or dwarfish wood.
Vast oaks and elms before his fury fall ;
The stately fir, tough ash, and cedar tall.
As when a fowler for the field prepares
His sylvan warfare ; ere he spreads his snares,
From stubble, reeds, and furze, th' obstructed land
Around he clears : no less Orlando's hand
Levels the trees that long had tower'd above,
For rolling years the glory of the grove !
The rustic swains that mid the woodland shade
Heard the loud crash, forsook their flocks that stray'd

Without a shepherd, while their masters flew
To learn the tumult and the wonder view.

SONNET.

From the same.

Translated by the Rev. C. Strong.

THE Sun was wrapt in veil of blackest dye,
That floating hung the horizon's verge around
The leaves all trembling moan'd with hollow sound
And bursting thunders peal'd along the sky ;

I saw fierce rain, or icy storm was nigh,
Yet ready stood o'er the rough waves to bound
Of that proud river in whose depths profound
The scorch'd remains of much-wept Phaëton lie ;

When turning to the further bank my view,
I caught thine eye's bright beam, and words I heard
That might some day Leander's fate renew ;

Instant the threatening clouds all disappear'd,
Shone out the fervent Sun, winds silent grew,
And smilingly the level stream career'd.

TO DANTE.

By Michel Angelo.*

How shall we speak of him, for our blind eyes
Are all unequal to his dazzling rays ?
Easier it is to blame his enemies
Than for the tongue to tell his lightest praise.
For us did he explore the realms of woe ;
And at his coming did high Heaven expand
Her lofty gates, to whom his native land
Refused to open her's. Yet shalt thou know,
Ungrateful city, in thine own despite,
That thou hast foster'd best thy Dante's fame ;
For virtue, when oppress'd, appears more bright,
And brighter therefore shall his glory be,
Suffering, of all mankind, most wrongfully,
Since in the world there lives no greater name.

DUEL BETWEEN TANCRED AND ARGANTES.

From the Italian of Tasso.

Translated by John Hoole.

Now wide-destroying death or pale affright
Remov'd the Pagans from their ramparts' height :
Alone, still fix'd to triumph or to fall,
Argantes turns not from th' abandon'd wall ;
Secure he stands, his front undaunted shows,
And singly combats midst a host of foes :
Far more than death he dreads a sullied name,
And, if he dies, would close his days with fame.
Before the rest intrepid Tancred flies
And lifts his falchion, and the chief defies :
Well, by his mien and arms confess'd to view,
His plighted foe the fierce Argantes knew.
" Thus dost thou, Tancred ! keep thy faith ? " he
" Late art thou come our battle to decide : [cried,
We meet not here as heroes heroes dare ;
Thou com'st a base artificer of war !
Those engines are thy guard, those troops thy shield ;
Thou bring'st strange weapons to disgrace the field !
Yet hope not from this hand, in dreadful strife,
(Thou woman's murderer !) now to 'scape with life !
He said ; and Tancred, smiling with disdain,
In words indignant thus replied again :
" Late am I come !—Suppress thy senseless scorn ;
Soon shalt thou find too speedy my return ;

* Died 1563.

† Born 1544.—Died 1595.

When thou shalt wish, to ease thy doubtful soul,
That 'twixt us Alps might rise, or oceans roll;
And know, by fatal proof too well display'd,
Nor fear detain'd my arms, nor sloth delay'd.
Come, glorious chief! thou terror of the plain,
By whom are heroes quell'd and giants slain!
With me retire, and prove thy boasted might;
The woman's murderer dares thee to the fight!"

Then to his troops—"Withhold your wrathful hands,

This warrior now my sword alone demands;
No common foe; by challenge him I claim;
By former promise mine, and mine by fame."

"Descend," again the proud Circassian cried,
"Or singly, or with aid, the cause decide:
The place frequented or the desert try;
With every odds thy prowess I defy!"

The stern convention made, at once they move,
With mutual ire, the dreadful fight to prove.
Already Tancred hopes the glorious strife,
And burns with zeal to take the Pagan's life:
He claims him wholly, all his blood demands,
And envies even a drop to vulgar hands.
He spreads his shield, forbids the threatening blow,
And guards from darts and spears his mighty foe.
They leave the walls, impatient of delay,
And through a winding path pursue their way.
At length, amid surrounding hills, they view'd
A narrow valley, black with shady wood;
That seem'd a sylvan theatre, design'd
For chase or combat with the savage-kind.
Here both the warriors stopp'd; when, pensive
grown,

Argantes turn'd to view the suffering town.
Tancred, who saw his foe no buckler wield,
Straight cast his own at distance on the field;
Then thus began—"What means this sudden gloom?
Think'st thou, at last, thy destin'd hour is come?
If such foreboding thoughts a doubt create,
Too late thy prescience, and thy fears too late."

"Yon city fills my mind," the chief replied,
"The queen of nations, and Judea's pride,
That vanquish'd now must fall, while I in vain
Attempt her sinking ruins to sustain:
How poor a vengeance can thy life afford,
Thy life by Heaven devoted to my sword!"

He ceas'd: then wary each to combat drew:
For each his adverse champion's valour knew,
Tancred was light, his joints were firmly knit,
Swift were his hands, and ready were his feet.
Argantes tower'd superior by the head,
With larger limbs, with shoulders broader spread.
Now Tancred wheels, now bends to elude the foe,
Now with his sword averts th' impending blow.
But high erect the bold Argantes stood,
And equal art, with different action, show'd:
Now here, now there, impetuous from above,
Against the prince the brandish'd steel he drove.
That, on his art and courage most relies;
This, on his mighty strength, and giant size.

Two vessels thus their naval strife, maintain,
When no rude wind disturbs the watery plain:
• Their bulk though different, equal is the fight,
In swiftness one, and one excels in height.

But while the Christian seeks to reach the foe,
And shuns the sword that seems to threaten the blow,
Full at his face the point Argantes shook;
Then swift, as Tancred turn'd toward the stroke,
He pierc'd his flank, and, loud exulting, said,
"Behold the crafty now by craft betray'd!"
With rage and shame indignant Tancred burn'd,
And all his thoughts to glorious vengeance turn'd;
Then with his falchion to the boast replies,
Where to his aim the vizor open lies.

Argantes breaks the blow: with shorten'd sword
On him intrepid rush'd the Christian lord:
The Pagan's better hand he seiz'd, and dy'd
With many a ghastly wound his bleeding side.
"Receive this answer," loud the hero cries,
"The vanquish'd to his victor thus replies!"

The fierce Circassian foams with rage and pain,
But strives to free his captive arm in vain:
At length, dependant from the chain, he leaves
The trusty falchion, and his hand reprieves.
Each other now in rude embrace they press'd,
Arms lock'd in arms, and breast oppos'd to breast.
Not with more vigour, on the sandy field,
Great Hercules the mighty giant held.
Such is their conflict, so the warriors strain,
Till both together, sidelong, press the plain.
Argantes, as he fell, by chance or skill,
Bore high his better arm releas'd at will:
But Tancred's hand, that should the weapon wield,
Was held beneath him prisoner on the field.
Full well the Frank th' unequal peril view'd,
And, soon recovering, on his feet he stood.

More slow the Saracen the ground forsook,
And, ere he rose, receiv'd a sudden stroke.
But as the pine, whose leafy summit bends
To Eurus' blast, at once again ascends;
So from his fall arose the Pagan knight
With equal wrath and unabated might.
Again with flashing swords, the war they wag'd:
Now less of art and more of horror rag'd,
From Tancred's wounds appear'd the trickling
blood;

But from Argantes pour'd a crimson flood:
Tancred full soon his feeble arm beheld
Slow and more slow the weighty falchion wield:
All hatred then his generous breast forsook,
And, back retreating, mildly thus he spoke:

"Yield, dauntless chief! enough thy worth is shown;

Or, me, or fortune, for thy victor own:
I ask no spoils, no triumph from the fight,
Nor to myself reserve a conqueror's right."

At this, with rage renew'd, the Pagan burn'd:
"Use what thy fortune gives," he fierce return'd,
"And dar'st thou then from me the conquest claim?
Shall base concessions stain Argantes' fame?
Alike thy mercy and thy threats I prize;
This arm shall yet thy senseless pride chastise."
As, near extinct, the torch new light acquires,
Revives its flame, and in a blaze expires:
So he, when scarce the blood maintain'd its course,
With kindled ire recruits his dying force;
Resolv'd his last of days with force to spend,
And crown his actions with a glorious end.

Grasp'd in each hand, his vengeful steel he took :
 In vain the Christian's sword oppos'd the stroke :
 Full on his shoulder fell the deadly blade,
 Nor, deaden'd there, its eager fury stay'd,
 But, glancing downward, deeply pierc'd his side,
 And stain'd his armour with a purple tide.
 Yet Tancred's looks nor doubt nor fear confess'd ;
 For Nature's self had steel'd his dauntless breast.
 A second stroke the haughty Pagan try'd ;
 The wary Christian now his purpose spy'd,
 And slipt, elusive, from the steel aside.
 Then, spent in empty air thy strength in vain,
 Thou fall'st, Argantes ! headlong on the plain :
 Thou fall'st ! yet (unsubdu'd alike in all)
 None but thyself can boast Argantes' fall !
 Fresh stream'd the blood from every gaping wound,

And the red torrent delug'd all the ground :
 Yet on his arm and knee the furious knight
 His bulk supported, and provok'd the fight.
 Again his hand the courteous victor stay'd :
 " Submit, O chief ! preserve thy life," he said :
 But, while he paus'd, the fierce insidious foe
 Full at his heel directs a treacherous blow,
 And threats aloud. Then flash from Tancred's eyes
 The sparks of wrath, while thus the hero cries :
 " And dost thou, wretch ! such base return afford
 For life so long preserv'd from Tancred's sword ?"

He said, and as he spoke, no more delay'd,
 But through his vizor plung'd th' avenging blade.
 Thus fell Argantes : as he liv'd he died ;
 Untam'd his soul, unconquer'd was his pride :
 Nor escap'd his spirit at th' approach of death,
 But threats and rage employ'd his latest breath.

Then Tancred in the shrath his sword bestow'd,
 And paid to God the thanks his conquest ow'd :
 But dear his triumph has the victor cost :
 His senses fail, his wonted strength is lost.
 Again he strives to pass the valley o'er,
 And tread the steps his feet had trod before.
 Not far his tottering knees their load sustain,
 His utmost strength he tries, but tries in vain.
 Now, laid on earth, his arm supports his head,
 (His arm that trembles like a feeble reed)
 Each object swims before his giddy sight ;
 The cheerful day seems chang'd to dusky night ;
 He faints—he swoons ! and scarce to mortal eyes
 The victor differing from the vanquish'd lies.

SONNET.

To Italy.

From the Italian of Filicaja.*

WHERE is thine arm, Italia ?—Why shouldst thou
 Fight with the strangers ?—fierce alike, to me
 Seem thy defender, and thine enemy ;
 Both were thy vassals once—though victors now.
 Thus dost thou guard the wreath that bound thy brow,
 The wreck of perish'd empire ?—When to thee
 Virtue and Valour pledged their fealty,
 Was this thy glorious promise, this thy vow ?

* Born 1642.—Died 1707.

Go then : reject thine ancient worth, and wed Degenerate Sloth : 'midst blood, and groans, and cries,
 Sleep on, all heedless of the loud alarms.
 Sleep, vile adulteress : from thy guilty bed.
 Too soon th' avenging sword shall bid thee rise,
 Or pierce thee slumbering in thy minion's arms.

ITALIA ! Italia ! O thou on whom was shed
 Beauty's ill-fated gift, whence springs such store
 Of troubles infinite, that anguish sore
 Hath o'er thy brow a cloud of sorrow spread !

Oh ! that thou wert less lovely, or more dread,
 That those might prize thee less, or fear thee more,
 Who now in lovers' guise thy charms adore,
 Yet aim the blow would leave their victim dead !

Then should I no more see, like wasteful flood,
 From Alp the foe pour down, nor Gallic steed
 Drink the Po's wave, that reddens with thy blood.

Nor wouldst thou, girt with weapon not thine own,
 Leave the hired stranger at thy post to bleed—
 In victory or defeat alike o'erthrown.

THE tree, which shaken of its royal boughs
 Gave with its trunk a shelter and a shade—
 Whose broad and towering top to heaven arose,
 High, as in earth its roots were deeply laid—
 Where men the nest of all their hopes had made,
 Whence Virtue sought support amidst her woes,
 The branches of whose glory broadly spread
 From the far West to where the Caspian flows—
 Yields, as its massy roots are rent away,
 And in its mighty ruin buries all
 That in the shelter of its shadow lay.
 It sinks as if the solid world gave way,
 Majestic in the thunder of its fall,
 And mighty, e'en in ruin and decay.

SONNET.

From the Italian of Metastasio†.

WHAT though the stream, that runs uncheck'd its race,
 Begins its rugged course in limpid light !
 Soon travel-stain'd, and with retarded pace
 Within some gloomy glen it hides from sight ;
 But, if confined within some narrow space,
 Soon high and strong its waves begin to rise,
 Till lo ! a beauteous fountain draws our eyes,
 And pilgrims turn to gaze upon its grace !

* See stanzas XLII. and XLIII. of the 4th canto of Byron's Child Harold, column 1109. They are nearly a literal translation of this celebrated sonnet.

† Born 1693.—Died 1782.

Ah me ! that luckless stream am I, which burns
 In every sunbeam—freezes in each frost—
 And, spent and soil'd, to this dark valley turns ;
 Whilst Thou—by holy hopes and thoughts engross'd—

Art that more fortunate Fount, which pure and bright,
 Soars up to Heaven, and sparkles in the light.

SONNET.

From the Italian of Giambattista Cotta.

"THERE is no God," the fool in secret said,
 "There is no God that rules or earth or sky."
 Rend the dark veil that shades the wretch's head,
 That God may burst upon his faithless eye.

Is there no God ? The stars in myriads spread,
 If he look up, the blasphemy deny,
 And his own features in the mirror read,
 Reflect the image of Divinity.

Is there no God ? The stream that silver flows,
 The air he breathes, the ground he treads, the trees,
 The flowers, the grass, the sands, each wind that blows,

All speak of God, throughout one voice agrees,
 And eloquent his dread existence shows ;—
 Blind to thyself, yet see him, fool in these.

SONNET.

From the Italian of Petrocchi.

I ASK'D of Time, "To whom arose this high Majestic pile here mouldering in decay ?"
 He answer'd not, but swifter sped his way,
 With ceaseless pinions winnowing the sky.

To Fame I turn'd : "Speak thou, whose sons defy
 The waste of years, and deathless works essay !"—
 She heaved a sigh as one to grief a prey,
 And silent downward cast her tearful eye.

Onward I pass'd, but sad and thoughtful grown,
 When stern in aspect, o'er the ruin'd shrine,
 I saw Oblivion stalk from stone to stone,

"Dread Power," I cried, "tell me whose high design"—
 He check'd my further speech in sullen tone,
 "Whose once it was I care not, now, 'tis mine."

SONNET.

To Homer.

From the Italian of Girolamo Fracastoro.

POET of Greece ! when'er thine ample page
 My soul enraptures with its noble strain,
 Whether it be Achilles' high disdain,
 Or wise Ulysses' toilsome pilgrimage,

Methinks that from some mountain's lofty stage
 I see towns, forests, rivers, and blue main,
 There desert wilds, and here the fruitful plain,
 Teeming with countless forms, my sight engage.

Such various climes, rites, laws, thy Muse explores,
 Unfolding sunny banks, and grottos cold,
 Valleys and mountains, promontories, shores,

'T would seem, so Heaven inspires thy genius bold,
 That Nature's self but copied from thy stores,
 Thou first great painter of the things of old !

From the Italian of Giovanni Della Casa.

THIS mortal life—that in its rapid night
 Counts but a few brief hours, obscure and cold—
 Had wrapt till now in clouds of thickest fold
 My purer soul, and dimm'd her sacred light.

At length thy mercies burst upon my sight,
 I see how fruits and flowers, and heat, and cold,
 And Heaven's sweet harmonies, by love controll'd,
 Proclaim, eternal God ! thy power and might.

Yea, the pure balmy air, the light so clear
 That the round world to our glad vision shows
 Were raised by thee from chaos dark and drear :

And all that shines on earth, in heaven that glows,
 Out of thick darkness thou hast made appear,
 And at thy word the day and sun arose.

SONNET†.

From the Italian of Giambattista Pastorini.

Written after the bombardment of Genoa by Louis XIV.

My Genoa, if I view with tearless eye
 Thy beautiful bosom in its blood bedew'd,
 'Tis not a thankless child's ingratitude,
 But that my struggling soul denies a sigh.

I glory in thy ruin'd majesty,
 Stern token of thy courage unsubdued ;
 Where'er I turn I see thy fragments strew'd,
 And in thy peril read thy prowess high.

The noblest triumph is to suffer well,
 And nobly hast thou triumph'd o'er thy foes
 In that immutable tranquillity ;

Still in thine honour'd walls may Freedom dwell ;
 Still may'st thou proudly say amidst thy woes,
 "Yes ! welcome Ruin ; never Slavery."

* This is a very celebrated Sonnet and has given birth to innumerable dissertations of Italian critics and commentators.

† This sonnet is cited by the Edinburgh Review as the finest in the Italian language.

THE SPIRIT OF THE CAPE.

From the Portuguese of Luis de Camoens.Translated by William Julius Mickle.*

"Now prosp'rous gales the bending canvass swell'd ;
 From these rude shores our fearless course we held :
 Beneath the glistening wave the god of day
 Had now five times withdrawn the parting ray,
 When o'er the prow a sudden darkness spread,
 And slowly floating o'er the mast's tall head
 A black cloud hover'd : nor appear'd from far
 The Moon's pale glimpse, nor faintly twinkling star ;
 So deep a gloom the louring vapour cast,
 Transfixt with awe the bravest stood aghast.
 Meanwhile a hollow hursting roar resounds,
 As when hoarse surges lash their rocky mounds ;
 Nor had the blackening wave nor frowning heaven
 The wonted signs of gathering tempest given.
 Amaz'd we stood—' O thou, our fortune's guide,
 Avert this omen, mighty God,' I cried ;
 ' Or through forbidden climes adventurous stray'd,
 Have we the secrets of the deep survey'd,
 Which these wide solitudes of seas and sky
 Were doom'd to hide from man's unhallow'd eye ?
 Whate'er this prodigy, it threatens more
 Than midnight tempests and the mingled roar,
 When sea and sky combine to rock the marble shore."

"I spoke, when rising through the darken'd air,
 Appall'd we saw a ludicrous phantom glare :
 High and enormous o'er the flood he tower'd,
 And thwart our way with sullen aspect lour'd ;
 An earthy paleness o'er his cheeks was spread,
 Erect uprose his hairs of wither'd red ;
 Writhing to speak, his sable lips disclose,
 Sharp and disjoint, his gnashing teeth's blue rows ;
 His haggard beard flow'd quivering on the wind,
 Revenge and horror in his mien combin'd ;
 His clouded front, by withering lightnings scar'd,
 The inward anguish of his soul declar'd.
 His red eyes glowing from their dusky caves
 Shot livid fires : far echoing o'er the waves
 His voice resounded, as the cavern'd shore
 With hollow groan repeats the tempest's roar.
 Cold gliding horrors thrill'd each hero's breast,
 Our bristling hair and tottering knees confess'd
 Wild dread ; the while with visage ghastly wan,
 His black lips trembling, thus the fiend began :

"O you, the boldest of the nations, fir'd,
 By daring pride, by lust of fame inspir'd,
 Who scornful of the bowers of sweet repose,
 Through these my waves advance your fearless prow,
 Regardless of the lengthening watery way,
 And all the storms that own my sovereign sway,
 Who mid surrounding rocks and shelves explore
 Where never hero brav'd my rage before ;
 Ye sons of Lusus, who with eyes profane
 Have view'd the secrets of my awful reign,
 Have pass'd the bounds which jealous Nature drew
 To veil her secret shrine from mortal view ;
 Hear from my lips what direful woes attend,
 And bursting soon shall o'er your race descend."

"With every bounding keel that dares my rage,
 Eternal war my rocks and storms shall wage,

The next proud fleet that through my drear domain
 With daring search shall hoise the streaming vane,
 That gallant navy, by my whirlwinds tost
 And raging seas, shall perish on my coast :
 Then he who first my secret reign descried,
 A naked corse wide floating o'er the tide
 Shall drive—Unless my heart's full raptures fail,
 O Lusus ! oft shalt thou thy children wail ;
 Each year thy shipwreck'd sons shalt thou deplore,
 Each year thy sheeted niasts shall strew my shore."

* * * * *

"He paus'd, in act still further to disclose
 A long, a dreary prophecy of woes :
 When, springing onward, loud my voice resounds,
 And midst his rage the threatening shade confounds :
 'What art thou, horrid form, that rid'st the air ?
 By Heaven's eternal light, stern fiend, declare.'
 His lips he writhes, his eyes far round he throws,
 And from his breast deep hollow groans arose ;
 Sternly askance he stood ; with wounded pride
 And anguish torn, 'In me, behold,' he cried,
 While dark-red sparkles from his eye-balls roll'd,
 'In me the spirit of the Cape behold,
 That rock by you the Cape of Tempests named,
 By Neptune's rage in horrid earthquakes framed,
 When Jove's red bolts o'er Titan's offspring flamed.
 With wide-stretch'd piles I guard the pathless strand,
 And Afric's southern mound unmov'd I stand :
 Nor Roman prow nor daring Tyrian oar
 Ere dash'd the white wave foaming to my shore -
 Nor Greece nor Carthage ever spread the sail
 On these my seas to catch the trading gale.
 You, you alone have dared to plough my main,
 And with the human voice disturb my lonesome
 reign."

"He spoke, and deep a lengthen'd sigh he drew,
 A doleful sound, and vanish'd from the view :
 The frighten'd billows gave a rolling swell,
 And distant far prolong'd the dismal yell ;
 Faint and more faint the howling echoes die,
 And the black cloud dispersing leaves the sky.
 High to the angel host, whose guardian care
 Had ever round us watch'd, my hands I rear,
 And Heaven's dread king implore, as o'er our head
 The fiend, dissolved, an empty shadow fled ;
 So may his curses by the winds of Heaven
 Far o'er the deep, their idle sport, be driven !"

GAMA'S ARRIVAL IN INDIA.

From the same and by the same translator.

Now more, serene in dappled gray, arose
 O'er the fair lawns where murmuring Ganges flows ;
 Pale shone the wave beneath the golden beam ;
 Blue o'er the silver flood Malabar's mountains gleam :
 The sailors on the main-top's airy round,
 "Land ! Land !" aloud, with waving hands, resound :
 Aloud the pilot of Melinda cries,
 "Behold, O chief, the shores of India rise !"
 Elate the joyful crew on tip-toe trod,
 And every breast with swelling raptures glow'd ;
 Gama's great soul confess'd the rushing swell,
 Prone on his manly knees the hero fell,

* Born 1517.—Died 1579.

"O bounteous Heaven," he cries, and spreads his hands

To bounteous Heaven, while boundless joy commands
No further word to flow. In wonder lost,
As one in horrid dreams through whirlpools tost,
Now snatch'd by demons rides the flaming air,
And howls, and hears the howlings of despair;
Awaked, amazed, confused with transport glows,
And, trembling still, with troubled joy o'erflows;
So, yet affected with the sickly weight
Left by the horrors of the dreadful night,
The hero wakes in raptures to behold
The Indian shores before his prow unfold:
Bounding he rises, and with eyes on fire
Surveys the limits of his proud desire.

O glorious chief, while storms and oceans raved,
What hopeless toils thy dauntless valour braved!
By toils like thine the brave ascend to Heaven,
By toils like thine immortal fame is given.
Not he who daily moves in ermine gown,
Who nightly slumbers on the couch of down;
Who proudly boasts through heroes old to trace
The lordly lineage of his titled race;
Proud of the smiles of every courtier lord,
A welcome guest at every courtier's board;
Not he, the feeble son of ease, may claim
Thy wreath, O Gama, or may hope thy fame.
'Tis he, who nurtured on the tented field,
From whose brown cheek each tint of fear expell'd,
With manly face unmoved, secure, serene,
Amidst the thunders of the deathful scene,
From horror's mouth dares snatch the warrior's crown,

His own his honours, all his fame his own:
Who proudly just to honour's stern commands,
The dog-star's rage on Afric's burning sands,
Or the keen air of midnight polar skies,
Long watchful by the helm, alike defies:
Who on his front, the trophies of the wars,
Bears his proud knighthood's badge, his honest scars;
Who cloth'd in steel, by thirst, by famine worn,
Through raging seas by bold ambition borne,
Scornful of gold, by noblest ardour fired,
Each wish by mental dignity inspired,
Prepared each ill to suffer or to dare,
To bless mankind, his great his only care;
Him whom her son mature experience owns,
Him, him alone heroic glory crowns.

THE VISIT OF THE GODS.

From the German of Schiller.*

Translated by S. T. Coleridge.

NEVER, believe me,
Appear the Immortals,
Never alone:

Scarce had I welcomed the Sorrow-beguiler,
Bacchus! but in came Boy Cupid the smiler;
Lo! Phæbus the glorious descends from his throne!
They advance, they float in, the Olympians all!
With divinities fills my terrestrial hall!

* Born 1759.—Died 1805.

How shall I yield you
Due entertainment,
Celestial quire?

Me rather, bright guests! with your wings of un-buoyance

Bear aloft to your homes, to your banquets of joyance,
That the roofs of Olympus may echo my lyre!

Ha! we mount! on their pinions they waft up my soul!

O give me the nectar!

O fill me the bowl!

Give him the nectar!

Pour out for the poet,

Hebe! pour free!

Quicken his eyes with celestial dew,
That Styx the detested no more he may view,
And like one of us gods may conceit him to be!
Thanks, Hebe! I quaff it! Io Pæan, I cry!
The wine of the Immortals forbids me to die!

CHORUS OF SOLDIERS.

From "The Bride of Messina, a Tragedy."

From the German of Schiller.

Translated by W. C. Hurry.

SAY then what shall we commence
Now that the Princes' strife will cease,
How pass the vacant hours of peace,
From weariness, find what defence?
Somewhat for the coming morrow
Man must fear, and hope, and sorrow,
To bear this lagging being's weight,
The daily sameness of his state,
And with action's fresh'ning breeze
Stir his life from stagnant ease.

One of the Chorus.

How beautiful is peace, a lovely child
He lies all day beside the murmuring brook,
Around him grazing sport the lambkins mild,
Whilst with his plaintive flute's melodious tone
He wakes the echoes from each mountain's nook,
Till evening lulls him to repose alone,—
But war has its honors, war has its charms
Give me the sight and the sound of arms.
Give me for pleasure a lively life
No pause of suspense in the joy of strife.
Give me the endless ebb and flow
Of fortune's sea, now falling low,
Now rising high, amidst hope or hate
The plaything of chance on the billows of fate.
For manhood in peace can scarce be shewn
Idle repose is the grave of might,
The laws befriend the weak alone
They promise to all an equal right.
But war makes way for the strong and the bold
She raises the talents her fields requite,
In them the great and the rare unfold
And even the timid grow brave in the fight.

A Second.

Are not love's temples ever open wide
Does not the world do homage to the fair,

There are the fears of scorn, the hopes beside,
He who delights the eye sits sovran there.
Love raises life's grey tones until they gleam
Like the bright clouds that paint the evening sky
Weaving the images of fancy's dream
In the sad web of dull reality.

A Third.

Leave the flowers of blooming spring,
Let the young pluck garlands there
To a graver god, the service bring
Of our manly age, than to Cupid fair.

The First.

Let us follow, through the forest wild
The stern Diana, patron of the chase
Where the tangled thickets bar the day
Where the roebuck tries his vent'rous race
For hunting is the mace of the fray,
The earnest war-god's ever pleasing bride.
Then let us over the mountains ride
Rising with the dawning light
Merrily out through the foggy dale
Whenever the quavering horns invite.
In the bracing breath of the morning gale
Refreshing our limbs with pure delight.

The Second.

Or shall we rather our lot confide
To the blue, the ever moving tide,
Whose friendly glances like mirror bright
To her boundless, heaving breast invite?
Shall we construct, as a castle afloat
On the dancing waves, a pleasant boat?
For who with hast'ning keel is hurled
O'er the crystal held, for him is the world.
He reaps the crops he has never sown
He is wedded to fortune, she is his own.
For the region of hope is the sea,
Ever the freakish realm of chance,
There the rich in a moment poor may be
And the poorest to princely wealth advance.
Like thought in swiftness, as the wind
Round the compass changes ever,
So fortune's rolling globe we find
Ranging still and resting never.

KNOWEST THOU THE LAND.

From the German of Goethe.*

Know'st thou the land where the lemon-trees bloom?
Where the gold orange glows in the deep thicket's gloom?
Where a wind ever soft from the blue heaven blows,
And the groves are of laurel and myrtle and rose?
Know'st thou it?

Thither! O thither,
My dearest and kindest, with thee would I go.

Know'st thou the house, with its turretted walls,
Where the chambers are glancing, and vast are the halls?

Where the figures of marble look on me so mild,
As if thinking: "Why thus did they use thee, poor child?"

* Born 1749. Died 18—.

Know'st thou it?

Thither! O thither,
My guide and my guardian, with thee would I go.

Know'st thou the mountain, its cloud-covered arch,
Where the mules among mist o'er the wild torrent march?

In the clefts of it, dragons lie coil'd with their brood;
The rent crag rushes down, and above it the flood.
Know'st thou it?

Thither! O thither,
Our way leadeth: Father! O come let us go!"

PROLOGUE IN HEAVEN.

The Lord and the Host of Heaven.

Enter three Archangels.

From the German of Goethe.

Translated by P. B. Shelley.

RAPHAEL.

THE sun makes music as of old
Amid the rival spheres of Heaven,
On its predestined circle roll'd
With thunder speed: the Angels even Draw strength from gazing on its glance,
Though none its meaning fathom may:—
The world's unwither'd countenance
Is bright as at creation's day.

GABRIEL.

And swift and swift, with rapid lightness,
The adorned Earth spins silently,
Alternating Elysian brightness
With deep and dreadful night; the sea
Foams in broad billows from the deep
Up to the rocks, and rocks and ocean,
Onward, with spheres which never sleep,
Are hurried in eternal motion.

MICHAEL.

And tempests in contention roar
From land to sea, from sea to land;
And, raging, weave a chain of power,
Which girds the earth, as with a band.
A flashing desolation there,
Flames before the thunder's way;
But thy servants, Lord! revere
The gentle changes of thy day.

CHORUS OF THE THREE.

The Angels draw strength from thy glance,
Though no one comprehend thee may;—
Thy world's unwither'd countenance
Is bright as on creation's day*.

* RAPHAEL.

The sun sounds, according to ancient custom,
In the song of emulation of his brother-spheres.
And its fore-written circle
Fulfills with a step of thunder.
Its countenance gives the Angels strength,
Though no one can fathom it,
The incredible high works
Are excellent as at the first day.

GABRIEL.

And swift, and inconceivably swift
The adornment of earth winds itself round,

BALLAD.

*From the German of Ludwig Uhland.
The Minstrel's Curse.*

So loftily in olden times a royal castle stood,
Wide looked it o'er a landscape of hill, and plain,
and flood;
And round it lay a garden, a bright and flowery ring,
Where flashed in rainbow splendour the gush of many a spring.

There dwelt a haughty monarch who ruled o'er far and near,
So pale he sate upon his throne, so gloomy was his cheer;
And what he thinks is terror, and what he looks is wrath—
And what he speaks is cruelty, and what he writes is death.

Once came there to the castle a noble minstrel pair,
The one with golden ringlets, the other gray of hair;
The old man bore his cherished harp, and gaily did
he ride,
And his young and gallant comrade went ever by his side.

Then spake the aged minstrel—"Now be prepared,
my son,
Think o'er our choicest melodies—collect thy deepest tone—
Thy mirthful and thy passion'd lays be ready thou to sing,
For all we need to soften the heart of yonder king."

And soon within the pillar'd hall the minstrels both were seen,
Where sate the throned monarch, and by his side
the queen;
The monarch fearfully arrayed, like the blood-red
Northern glare,
The lady like the glorious moon, so gentle and so
fair;

And exchanges Paradise-clearness
With deep dreadful night.
The sea foams in broad waves
From its deep bottom, up to the rocks,
And rocks and sea are torn on together
In the eternal swift course of the spheres.

MICHAEL.

And storms roar in emulation
From sea to land, from land to sea,
And make, raging, a chain
Of deepest operation round about.
There flames a flashing destruction
Before the path of the thunderbolt.
But thy servants, Lord, revere
The gentle alternations of thy day.

Thy countenance gives the Angels strength,
Though none can comprehend thee:
And all thy lofty works
Are excellent as at the first day.

Such is a literal translation of this astonishing Chorus; it is impossible to represent in another language the melody of the versification; even the volatile strength and delicacy of the ideas escape in the crucible of translation, and the reader is surprised to find a caput mortuum.—Author's Note.

The old man touch'd his favourite harp, he touch'd
it wondrous well,
That richer, ever richer rose the music's kindling
swell:
Then poured with heavenly clearness the young man's strain along,
Betwixt his master's melody, like a happy spirit's
song.

They sang of spring; they sang of love, of the golden days of youth,
Of freedom and immortal deeds, of virtue and of truth;
They sang of every tender thought that makes the bosom thrill,
They sang of every lofty deed which makes it loftier
still.

The courtiers ceased from jesting—their hearts were overawed—
The warriors of the monarch they bowed themselves to God;
The queen, in love and transport, more melted than the rest,
Threw down unto the minstrel the rose from out her breast.

"Ye have misled my people, and dare ye shame my queen!"
The king cried out in anger, he stepped in wrath between;
He plunged his weapon, lightning-swift, into the young man's side,
And marr'd the gush of golden song in nature's rud-
diest tide.

The courtier crowd are scattered in terror and alarm—
The youth hath fallen senseless into his master's arm,
Who wrapp'd his mantle round him, and placed him
on his steed,
And bound the body upright, and left the place with speed.

But by the lofty portal, there stopped the minstrel gray,
There seized he on his harp which bore the prize
from all away;
And 'gainst a marble pillar that jewel hath he flung,
And spoke, till with his prophet voice the hall and garden rung—

'Wo to thee, haughty palace! O never may the strain
Of harp, or lute, or melody be raised in thee again!
No! only may the step of slaves, the sigh and bitter groan,
Be heard 'till the avenging sprite hath torn thee stone from stone.

"Wo to ye, airy gardens, in the glorious light of May!
To you this bleeding corpse, this sight of ruin I display;
That a spell may come upon ye, that your fountains
may abate,
And that for ever ye may lie destroyed and desolate!"

"Wo to thee, wicked murderer! To bards a curse and shame—

In vain be all thy strivings for a bloody wreath of fame:

Forgotten be thy very name—forgotten and for aye,
Lost utterly in empty air, like a wretch's latest sigh!"

The old man hath proclaimed it, and heaven hath heard his call;

Low lies the haughty palace, and ruin'd is the hall;
And but one pillar standeth yet of all its perished might,

And that, already cleft in twain, may fall before the
night.

And round, instead of gardens, is a dry and barren
land;

No tree gives shade or shelter, no fountain slakes
the sand;

No song, no roll of chivalry, that monarch's name
rehearse,

Unnoticed—unremembered—that is the Minstrel's Curse!

TO DEATH.

From the German of Gluck.

MEETHINKS it were no pain to die
On such an eve, when such a sky
O'er-canopies the west;
To gaze my fill on yon calm deep,
And, like an infant, fall asleep
On earth, my mother's breast.

There's peace and welcome in yon sea
Of endless blue tranquillity.

These clouds are living things;
I trace their veins of liquid gold,—
I see them solemnly unfold
Their soft and fleecy wings:

These be the angels that convey
Us weary children of a day,
Life's tedious nothing o'er,
Where neither passions come, nor woes,
To vex the genius of repose
On Death's majestic shore.

No darkness there divides the sway
With startling dawn and dazzling day;
But gloriously serene
Are the interminable plains;—
One fixed, eternal sunset reigns
O'er the wide silent scene!

I cannot doff all human fear,—
I know thy greeting is severe
To this poor shell of clay;—
Yet come, O Death! thy freezing kiss
Emancipates! thy rest is bliss!
I would I were away.

5 P

THE SWORD SONG.

From the German of Körner.

By Cyrus Redding.

Thou sword upon my belted vest,
Why glitters thus thy polished crest,
Kindling high ardours in my breast,
From thy bright beams?—Hurrah!

A horseman brave supports my blade,
Proud for a freeman to be made—
For him I shine, for him I wade
Through blood and death.—Hurrah!

Yes, my good sword, behold me free,
In fond affection bound to thee,
As though thou wert betrothed to me,
A first dear bride.—Hurrah!

Soldier of Freedom, I am thine!
For thee alone my beams shall shine
When, soldier, shall I call thee mine
Joined in the field?—Hurrah!

When the shrill trumpet's summons flies,
When red guns flash upon the skies,
Then will our bridal sun arise,
And join our hands.—Hurrah!

O welcome union! haste away,
Ye tardy moments of delay!
I long, my bridegroom, for the day
To wear thy wreath.—Hurrah!

Why restless in thy scabbard, why,
Thou iron child of destiny?
So wild, as if the battle-cry
Thou heardest now.—Hurrah!

Impatient in my dread reserve,
Restless in battle-fields to serve,
I burn our freedom to preserve
Thus with bright gleams.—Hurrah!

Rest, but a little longer rest,
In a short space thou shalt be blest,
Within my ardent grasp compest,
Ready for fight.—Hurrah!

Then let me not too long await—
I love the gory field of fate,
Where Death's rich roses blow elate
In bloody bloom.—Hurrah!

Then out, and from thy bondage fly,
Thou treasure of the freeman's eye!
Come, to the scene of slaughter hie,
Our nuptial home.—Hurrah!

Thus be our glorious marriage tie,—
Wedded beneath heaven's canopy;
Bright as a sunbeam of the sky
Glitters my bride.—Hurrah!

Then, forth for the immortal strife,
Thou German soldier's new-made wife !
Glow's not each heart with tenfold life
Embracing thee?—Hurrah !

While in thy scabbard at my side,
I seldom gazed on thee, my bride—
Our hands now joined, we'll ne'er divide ;
Ever in sight.—Hurrah !

Thee sparkling to my lips I press,
And thus my ardent vows profess—
O cursed be he beyond redress
Who parts us now !—Hurrah !

“Come joy into thy polished eyes,
Let thy bright glances flashing rise—
Our marriage day dawns in the skies,
My Bride of Steel.—Hurrah !”

THE RETURN.

From the German of C. Mächler.

Art thou the land with which my fancy teems, Whose golden plains once brightly round me
shone ?
Which oft hath shed sweet magic o'er my dreams,
And cheer'd me on with hope when feeble grown ?
Art thou the land ? Art thou the land ?
I greet thee, I greet thee, O my fatherland !

Art thou the town, beside the rippling stream,
Toward which, in sadness, oft my eye I've cast ?
Where life's unclouded spring did on me beam,
And the young hours in thrilling pleasure passed ?
Art thou the town ? Art thou the town ?
To thee, to thee I come, O native town !

Art thou the home in which my cradle stood,
Where sorrow's bitter pang I never knew ?
The future there appeared a glowing flood,
The world a path, where joys celestial grew.
Art thou the home ? Art thou the home ?
Receive me once again, paternal home !

Are ye the meads ? Art thou the peaceful vale,
Which oft at silent eve, I've blithely crossed ?
My spirit then would o'er your bound'ries steal,
Until each trace in fading blue was lost.
Are ye the meads ? Are ye the meads ?
Receive me once again, O native meads !

Could I here rest, and rural joys be mine,
The storm would cease—a brighter morning break;
My pilgrim-staff I'd to the brook consign,
And, borne by friendship, life's last journey take
To thee, O grave—To thee, O grave,
Where rest my fathers ; gladly, then, O grave !

TO EBERT.

From the German of Klopstock.

EBERT, a dark and melancholy thought
Hath seized me ;—vainly o'er the sparkling wine
Thou bidd'st me cherish happier images ;—
I must away and weep,—and haply tears
Will bring relief ; and I will weep away
All sadness !—Soothing tears !—how merciful—
How wise is Heaven !—Companions of man's grief,
Tears, soothing tears, are given ! oh say, could man,
Unblest with tears, unprivileged to weep
His miseries, endure life's weary weight ?
I must away and weep !—this mournful thought
Weights on my heart, and still oppresses me ;—
Ebert—a moment dwell upon the thought—
Our friends—suppose them dead—the quiet grave
Covering all—a silent sanctuary ;—
And we—alone on earth—abandoned here—
Of all that once we loved the sad survivors !—
Are thou not dumb with fear ? does not thine eye
Gleam timid round, then gaze in fixed trance
As tho' the soul had fled ?—thus my sight died
Away, thus trembled I, when the dread thought
First thundered on my soul.—

Red beam of heaven,
That when the wanderer on his homeward road
Thinks of the joys that wait him—of his son
Elate in youthful strength, the blooming cheek
Of his daughter, when already Fancy gives His wife's embrace,—red beam of heaven, thou comest ;

In silence thou dost smite, and slay, and wither
The wanderer's bones to dust, then triumphing
Dost seek the heights of heaven ; thus flash'd the thought

Upon my shuddering spirit, and my eye
Swam round in darkness, and my failing knees
Shivered and sank :—in the silence of the night
I saw the vision of the dead,—I saw
All pass away ;—in the silence of the night
I saw the open graves of all my friends !—

When Giseke's mild eye no longer smiles :—
When worthy Cramer, thou shalt fade removed
From thy loved Rudikin ;—when Gärtner dies,—
And Rabener's voice Socratic breathes no more ;—
When every string in princely Gellert's heart
Hath stilled its music ;—when beyond the grave
Kind-hearted Rothé seeks his old companions ;—
When Schlegel's mourning friends no more receive
Memorials of the exile's changeless love !—
And when in Schmidt's embrace my eye no more
Utters in tears the language of the heart ;—
When Hagedorn—our father Hagedorn—
Sleeps the last sleep ;—what, Ebert, are we then ?—
Coheirs of pain, whom sad fatality
Condemns to linger here. A darker thought
Shadows my soul ; should one of us then die,
And one yet hang on earth, and should I be
That one ; should she too pass into the grave
Whom yet I know not, but whose love shall bless
Long years of after life, and gilds e'en now
Many a lone hour,—should she too pass away

Into the grave*,—and I be left alone,
 A lingerer on earth without a friend,— Wilt thou, my soul, thou who wert form'd for friendship,
 Behold those desert days, and yet retain
 Thy faculties and feelings? or benumbed,
 Wilt thou forget the past, and slumber on
 In sullen apathy? But shouldst thou wake
 To feel thy wants, undying, suffering spirit;
 But shouldst thou wake, then from the grave call back
 The image of my friend, and it will sooth me!

Graves of the dead! beds where my friends repose,
 Why are ye separate? why lie ye not
 Together in one valley or deep grove?
 —Oh! who will lead the lonely grave old man;
 For I would wander on with tottering step
 To plant on every grave a cypress-tree,
 And tend, for after years, the mournful shrub,
 Too young as yet from summer suns to screen
 The lonely mound;—in the silence of the night
 Oft will I see the spirits of my friends
 Upon the stirring boughs;—in some such hour
 Will tremble, gaze on heaven, and weep, and die!—
 Oh bury then the dead beside the grave
 Near which he died! Thou, mouldering earth, receive
 My tears and me!—

Hence, melancholy dream!
 Oh cease to roll like thunder thro' the heart,
 Dreadful as Judgment;—as Eternity
 Awful!—Dark images, away—the soul
 No longer can support the stunning thought.

THE MOSS ROSE.

From the German.

THE angel of the flowers one day,
 Beneath a rose-tree sleeping lay,
 That spirit to whom charge is given
 To bathe the young buds in dews of heaven;
 Awaking from his light repose,
 The angel whispered to the Rose:
 'O fondest object of my care,
 Still fairest found, where all are fair;
 For the sweet shade thou givest to me,
 Ask what thou wilt 'tis granted thee.'
 'Then,' said the Rose, with deepened glow,
 'On me another grace bestow.'—
 The spirit paused in silent thought,
 What grace was there that flower had not?
 'Twas but a moment—o'er the rose
 A veil of moss the angel throws,
 And robed in nature's simplest weed,
 Could there a flower that rose exceed?

RURAL FETES.

*From Jocelyn, a Poem by Lamartine, the French Poet.
 (Translated by an Edinburgh Reviewer.)*

How calm that morn above the valley breaks:
 Each roof to light beneath its light awakes;
 The lattice bolts, with earliest day withdrawn,
 Let in, like some familiar friend, the dawn;
 Slow rising through the air in azure piles,
 The smoke from every humble cottage coils;
 And, bounding through the valleys, runs the knell
 Light-floating, jocund, of the pious bell.
 Roused by the peal, the village maidens peep
 Through their half-opened casements, half asleep;
 Each unto each some kindly greeting sending,
 While some are seen from high balconies bending,
 Combing their tresses, like a shower descending;
 Then with bare feet, and robe that round them swims
 Transparent, such as clasps a statue's limbs,
 Down tripping glide, to cull with rosy fingers
 The flower on which the morning's moisture lingers;
 Whose dewdrops trickling down their necks of snow,
 Like pearls escaping from a neck's lace show,
 Each flowery path that from the wood leads down,
 With steps, with sounds, with voices of its own
 Resounds; straw hats are mingling with the green;
 And crimson stays round slender waists are seen;
 And hurrying groups, that hour on hour glide past,
 Till round the village-elm all meet at last.
 What scenes of kind embrace and happy greeting!
 Gray hairs the brows of youthful maidens meeting—
 Old feelings all revived, old friends regained,
 And stranger guests to rustic feasts constrained.
 The virgins kneeling round the chapel walls,
 The pious groups the pealing bell recalls
 Chaplet in hand, and brows devoutly bent,
 To dedicate to God the day he lent.

How gay with growing eve the dances grew!
 And still the more, the more the day withdrew
 His jealous light; as if to snatch the treasure
 Which time with every moment stole from pleasure.
 Each orchard with its woodland choir was graced,
 Its little band on blocks of timber placed;
 The fife's shrill note, the hautboy's softer tone,
 The pipe slow breathing out its airy groan;
 Lively the one, the other plaintive—blending
 In melody or deep accord, and sending
 'Together, or by turns, in varying strains
 The thrill of pleasure through the throbbing veins,
 Eyes seek each other, hands each other press,
 Answering the notes with timid, fond caress.
 Love, like a whirlwind, in his restless sway,
 Bears, two by two, the loving pairs away.
 Feet, hands, and hearts, touched by the spell of love,
 Obedient to the common madness move;
 They meet, they part, but meet as soon as parted:
 So when the summer eve his beams has darted
 Upon the sultry sand that lines the shore,
 A crowd of glittering specks are seen to soar;
 To rise, to sink, now meeting, now divided.
 By some invisible attraction guided,

* This strange conceit about a future mistress is often alluded to in Klopstock's smaller poems; see particularly "De Künftige Geliebte."

A flickering fiery column high uprearing,
And in the sunbeam's radiant sphere careering.

Then later, when the fife and hautboy's voice
Began to languish like a failing voice,
And moistened ringlets by the dance unstrung,
Close to the cheek in drooping tresses clung,
And wearied groups along the darkening green
Gliding, in converse soft and low, were seen,
What sounds enchanting to the ear are muttered !
Adieus, regrets, the kiss, the word half uttered—
My soul was stirred ; my ear with sweet sounds rife
Drank languidly the luscious draught of life ;
I followed with my step, my heart, my eye,
Each maiden that with wearied eyes went by,
Thrilled at the rustle of each silken dress,
And felt that each that passed still left a joy the less.
At last the dance is hushed, the din at rest,
The moon is risen above the mountain's crest ;
Only some lover, heedless of the hour,
Wends homeward, dreaming, to his distant bower ;
Or, where the village-paths divide, there stand
Some loitering couples, lingering hand in hand,
Who start to hear the clock's unwelcome knell,
Then dive and vanish in the forest dell.

And now I am at home, alone. 'Tis night.
All still within the house, no fire, no light.
Let me, too, sleep. Alas ! no sleep is there !
Pray then !—My spirit will not hear my prayer,
My ear is still with dancing measures ringing,
Echoes which memory back to sense is bringing ;
I close my eyes—before my inward glance
Still swims the fête, still whirls the giddy dance :
The graceful phantoms of the vanished ball
Come flitting by in beauty each and all ;
A glance still haunts my couch ; a soft hand seems
To press my hand, that trembles in my dreams,
Fair tresses in the dance's flight brought nigh,
Just touch my cheek, and like the wind flow by,
I see from maiden brows the roses falling,
I hear beloved lips my name recalling—
Anne, Lucy, Blanche !—Where am I—What is this ?
What must love be, when even love's dream is bliss !

SUMMER RAIN.

From the French of Victor Hugo.

THE rain, the rain, the summer rain !
How sweet this balmy eve !
My footsteps on the velvet grass,
A greener print they leave.
The bird beneath those weeping boughs
(Heaven bless him !) shakes his wing,
And singing to the wind, that makes
A stilly murmuring,
Watches the rain-drops as they fall,
Like pearls from some gay coronal.

The shower, the summer shower is past ;
Again th' unclouded sky
Smiles on the glittering fields, beneath
A silver net that lie.
The streamlet of the plain, grown fierce,
With blades of grass, and store
Of sleeping lizards burthened,
Speeds on, and tumbling o'er
Some dangerous pebble's precipice,
Makes Niagaras to the mice !

Whirling amain on that wild flood,
Some oarless insects sweep,
Perched on a larger insect's wing,
A wreck upon the deep ;
Or, clinging to some floating isle,—
A withered leaf,—they deem
Their troubles light, if, pendant o'er
The brink of that rude stream,
A straw's majestic point appear,
To stop them in their dread career.

The currents o'er the sand have gushed,
The vapours sunward fly ;
The dim horizon, dimmer grown,
Escapes the gazer's eye.
And now a few bright trembling specks,
Like lonely stars are seen ;
Till rushing on the sight, the hills
Have burst the veil between,
While thousand rain-brooks bubbling down,
Stream from their bare and shining crown.

Oh, come—along the humid plain—
Come, by the linden grove,
Thy gentle arm embracing mine !
Alone, we there may rove.
But ere the sloping hill we leave,
A moment turn thine eyes
Where palaces and huts are bright
With sunset's gorgeous dies.
And, on a heaven of darkest blue,
A golden city shuts the view.

Oh see ! from yonder misty roofs,
A thousand smokes ascend ;
There happy hearts and kindred sighs
In sweet communion blend.
The windows flashing in the sun,
A light like torches fling ;
The illuminated city shows
A noiseless triumphing :—
Such be the coarsest lights that fall
On nature's sun-set festival.

The rainbow—oh ! the rainbow, see
Grasping the illumined sky ;
A treasure the Almighty sends,
When rains and tempests fly.
How oft, eternal spheres ! my soul
Has longed for wings of wind,
That some Ithuriel I might crave
The secret to unbind—
To what far worlds of endless day
That golden sun-bridge leads the way.

THE OBSEQUIES OF DAVID THE PAINTER.

Ex-member of the National Convention.From the French of M. Béranger.*

THE pass is barred ! " Fall back ! " cries the guard ;
 " cross not the French frontier ! "

As with solemn tread, of the exiled dead the funeral drew near.

For the sentinelle hath noticed well what no plume,
 no pall can hide,

That yon hearse contains the sad remains of a banished regicide !

" But pity take, for his glory's sake," said his children to the guard ;

Let his noble art plead on his part—let a grave be his reward !

France knew his name in her hour of fame, nor the aid of his pencil scorned ;

Let his passport be the memory of the triumphs he adorned ! "

" That corpse can't pass ! 'tis my duty, alas ! " said
 the frontier sentinelle.

" But pity take, for his country's sake, and his clay
 do not repel

From its kindred earth, from the land of his birth ! " cried the mourners, in their turn.

" Oh ! give to France the inheritance of her painter's funeral urn :

His pencil traced, on the Alpine waste of the path-
 less Mont Gothard,

Napoleon's course on the snow-white horse !—let a grave be his reward !

For he loved this land—ay, his dying hand to paint
 her fame he'd lend her :

Let his passport be the memory of his native country's splendour ! "

" Ye cannot pass," said the guard, " alas ! (for tears bedimmed his eyes)

Though France may count to pass that mount a glorious enterprise."

" Then pity take, for fair Freedom's sake," cried the mourners once again :

" Her favourite was Leonidas, with his band of Spartan men ;

Did not his art to them impart life's breath, that France might see

What a patriot few in the gap could do at old Thermopylae ?

Oft by that sight for the coming fight was the youthful bosom fired :

Let his passport be the memory of the valour he inspired ! "

* The painter David, then a member of the Convention, had voted for the death of Louis XVI. ; subsequently the imperial artist, whose glorious picturings of " The Passage of the Alps by Bonaparte," of " The Spartans at Thermopylae," and " The Emperor in his Coronation Robes," shed such radiance on his native land. The Bourbons had the bad taste not only to enforce the act of proscription in his case while he lived, but to prohibit his dead body from being interred in the French territory. His tomb is in Brussels, but his paintings form the ornament of the Louvre ; and he has been fortunate enough to be sung by Béranger, thus doubly certain of immortality.—Fraser's Magazine..

† Born 1780.

" Ye cannot pass."—" Soldier, alas ! a dismal boon
 we crave—

Say is there not some lonely spot where his friends
 may dig a grave ;

Oh ! pity take, for that hero's sake, whom he gloried to portray

With crown and palm at Nôtre Dame on his coronation-day.

Amid that band the withered hand of an aged pon-tiff rose,

And blessing shed on the conqueror's head, forgiving
 his own woes :

He drew that scene—nor dreamt, I ween, that yet a little while,

And the hero's doom would be a tomb far off in a lonely isle ! "

" I am charged, alas, not to let you pass," said the sorrowing sentinelle ;

" His destiny must also be a foreign grave ! "—" 'Tis
 well !—

Hard is our fate to supplicate for his bones a place
 of rest,

And to bear away his banished clay from the land that he loved best.

But let us hence !—Sad recompence for the lustre that he cast,

Blending the rays of modern days with the glories of the past !

Our sons will read with shame this deed (unless my mind doth err) ;

And a future age make pilgrimage to the painter's sepulchre ! "

THE THREE-COLOURED FLAG.

From the same.

COMRADES, around this humble board,
 Here's to our banner's by-gone splendour,
 There may be treason in that word—

All Europe may the proof afford—

All France be the offender ;

But drink the toast

That gladdens most,

Fires the young heart and cheers the old—

" May France once more

Her tri-color

Blest with new life behold ! "

List to my secret. That old flag

Under my bed of straw is hidden,

Sacred to glory ! War-worn rag !

Thee no *inform*er thence shall drag,

Nor dastard spy say 'tis forbidden.

France, I can vouch,

Will, from its couch,

The dormant symbol yet unfold,

And wave once more .

Her tri-color

Through Europe, uncontrolled !

For every drop of blood we spent,
 Did not that flag give value plenty ?
 Were not our children as they went,
 Jocund, to join the warrior's tent,
 Soldiers at ten, heroes at twenty ?
 France ! who were then
 Your noblemen ?
 Not they of parchment-must and mould !
 But they who bore
 Your tri-color
 Through Europe, uncontrolled !

Leipsic hath seen our eagle fall,
 Drunk with renown, worn out with glory ;
 But, with the emblem of old Gaul
 Crowning our standard, we'll recall
 The brightest days of Jemmappe's story !
 With terror pale
 Shall despots quail,
 When in their ear the tale is told,
 Of France once more
 Her tri-color
 Preparing to unfold !

Far be the lawless ruffian chiel,
 Worse than the vilest monarch he !
 Down with the dungeon and Bastille !
 But let our country never kneel
 To that grim idol, Anarchy !
 Strength shall appear
 On our frontier—
 France shall be Liberty's stronghold !
 And Earth once more
 The tri-color
 With blessing shall behold !

O my old flag ! that liest hid,
 There where my sword and musket lie—
 Banner, come forth ! for tears unbid
 Are filling fast a warrior's lid,
 Which thou alone canst dry.
 A soldier's grief
 Shall find relief ;
 A veteran's heart shall be consoled—
 France shall once more
 Her tri-color
 Triumphant unfold !

THE BLIND MOTHER.

From the same.

I.

LISTEN, daughter, listen, Lizzy,
 Whilst your wheel pursues its rounds ;
 At Colin's name your brain is dizzy,
 Your fluttering bosom bounds.
 Ah, of him take heed, and fear ;
 Though I'm blind, I well can hear,
 And the traitor all too near
 Your soft low sighs reveal ;
 Ah, I'm sure it must be so !
 Why the casement open throw ?
 Lizzy, mind your wheel.

II.

" 'Tis warm," you cry ; you're warm, in sooth !
 But do not at the window stand,
 And to the ever-watchful youth
 Cast looks, or kiss your hand.
 You do not like to hear me scold ;
 Ah, Liz, I was not always old,
 Early I learnt that love is bold,
 Lost honour nought can heal,
 And virtue gone, returns no more.
 Ah, I hear some one at the door,
 I do not hear your wheel !

III.

" It is the wind," you cry, " that howls,
 And makes the hinges shake and creak ;"
 And that old dog of mine that growls,
 You silence with a kick.
 Yes, take advantage of three-score ;
 But Colin, Liz, will cheat you more ;
 Take heed you have not to deplore
 The charms you now reveal.
 What ! do my ears hear truly ? yes,
 I hear a deep, soft, tender kiss.
 Liz, you have left your wheel.

IV.

" 'Tis but your little bird," you cry, " it Loves at your kissing lips to peck ;"
 Liz, keep that pet of yours more quiet,
 Or I must wring his neck.
 Of one false step beware, beware,
 It cannot be retrac'd, take care ;
 Know, he who leads you to the snare
 Mocks the delight you feel ;
 Ay, mocks you in enjoyment's hour.
 Ah, you are stealing to the bower,
 Liz, Liz, you've left your wheel.

V.

" You go to take a nap," you say ;
 Ah Lizzy, fie, 'tis no such thing !
 Send Colin, (for he's here,) away,
 Or let him bring the ring ;
 And stir not from your mother's side
 Until you go to church a bride ;
 Then, when the gordian knot is tied,
 You need not him conceal.
 So, spin away ; and, Lizzy, hist,
 Get not your thread or fame a-twist !
 You'd better mind your wheel.

THE MARSEILLES HYMN.

From the French of M. Rouget de l'Isle.*

YE sons of France awake to glory,
 Hark ! what myriads bid you rise,
 Your children, wives, and grandsires hoary ;
 Behold their tears and hear their cries :

* M. ROUGET DE L'ISLE, author of the words and music of this noble composition, was born at Louis le Saulnier, in the department of the Jura, May 10, 1760. He is now therefore in his seventieth year, enjoying a second spring of hope and glory.

At the breaking out of the first Revolution, M. de l'Isle was an officer of engineers. He adopted the new opinions with fervour, and out of the heat of his patriotism struck the Hymn before us, which is said to have added many thousands to the

Shall hateful tyrants, mischief breeding,
With hireling hosts, a ruffian band,
Affright and desolate the land,
While peace and liberty lie bleeding ?
To arms, to arms, ye brave,
The avenging sword unsheath,
March on, march on, all hearts resolv'd
On victory or death !

Now, now the dangerous storm is rolling,
Which treach'rous kings, confederate, raise ;
The dogs of war let loose, are howling,
And lo ! our fields and cities blaze ;
And shall we basely view the ruin,
While lawless force, with guilty stride,
Spreads desolation far and wide,
With crimes and blood his hands embru'ing ?
To arms, to arms, ye brave,
The avenging sword unsheath,
March on, march on, all hearts resolv'd
On victory or death !

With luxury and pride surrounded,
The vile insatiate despots dare,
Their thirst of power and gold unbounded,
To mete and vend the light and air :
Like beasts of burden would they load us,
Like gods, would bid their slaves adore :
But man is man, and who is more ?
Then shall they longer lash and goad us ?
To arms, to arms, ye brave,
The avenging sword unsheath,
March on, march on, all hearts resolv'd
On victory or death !

O Liberty ! can man resign thee,
Once having felt thy gen'rous flame ?
Can dungeons, bolts, and bars confine thee,
Or whips thy noble spirit tame ?
Too long the world has wept, bewailing,
That falsehood's dagger tyrants wield ;
But freedom is our sword and shield,
And all their arts are unavailing.
To arms, ye brave, &c.

FIDELITY.

(From the Spanish).

ONE eve of beauty, when the sun
Was on the streams of Guadalquivir,
To gold converting, one by one,
The ripples of the mighty river ;

French armies. He was before known as a man of letters and a composer. In 1796 he had produced an ode to Hope (Hymne a l'Esperance) and a small dramatic piece entitled Adelaide and Monville. From time to time he has subsequently published other pieces, both in verse and prose. We have seen none of them but the Marseilles Hymn. It is seldom that a writer has the good fortune to be able to compose such fine music, and at the same time to have written words not unworthy of it.

This great song of liberty was no sooner heard, than it was heard every where. It was shouted in the streets ; it filled the theatres : it was struck up wherever freedom was to be expressed, or tyrants daunted : it was thundered forth by whole armies. A celebrated living poet saw the French army after the battle of Hohenlinden, enter that town, singing the Marseilles Hymn, in one mighty and victorious body.—Leigh Hunt's Teller, Sept. 20, 1830.

Beside me on the bank was seated
A Seville girl with auburn hair,
And eyes that might the world have cheated,
A wild, bright, wicked, diamond pair !

She stooped, and wrote upon the sand,
Just as the loving sun was going,
With such a soft, small, shining hand,
I could have sworn 't was silver flowing.
Her words were three, and not one more,
What could Diana's motto be ?
The Syren wrote upon the shore—
'Death, not Inconstancy !'

And then her two large languid eyes
So turned on mine, that, lackadaisy !
I set the air on fire with sighs,
And was the fool she chose to make me.
Saint Francis would have been deceived
With such an eye and such a hand :
But one week more, and I believed
As much the woman as the sand.

ZARA'S EAR-RINGS.

From the Spanish.By J. G. Lockhart.*

"My ear-rings ! my ear-rings ! they've dropt into the well,
And what to say to Muça, I cannot, cannot tell."—
'T was thus Granada's fountain by, spoke Albuarez' daughter,
"The well is deep, far down they lie, beneath the cold blue water—
To me did Muça give them, when he spake his sad farewell,
And what to say when he comes back, alas ! I cannot tell.

"My ear-rings ! my ear-rings ! they were pearls in silver set,
That when my Moor was far away, I ne'er should him forget ;
That I ne'er to other tongue should list, nor smile on other's tale,
But remember he my lips had kissed, pure as those ear-rings pale.
When he comes back, and hears that I have dropped them in the well.
Oh what will Muça think of me, I cannot, cannot tell.

"My ear-rings ! my ear-rings ! he'll say they should have been,
Not of pearl and of silver, but of gold and glittering sheen,
Of jasper and of onyx, and of diamond shining clear,
Changing to the changing light, with radiance insincere—
That changeful mind unchanging gems are not befitting well—
Thus will he think—and what to say, alas ! I cannot tell.

"RECUERDE ET ALMA DORMIDA."

From the Spanish.

O LET the soul its slumber break,
 Arouse its senses, and awake,
 To see how soon
 Life with its glories glides away,
 And the stern footstep of decay
 Comes stealing on.

How pleasure, like the passing wind,
 Fades from our grasp, and leaves behind
 But grief at last :

How still our present happiness
 Seems to the wayward fancy less
 Than what is past.

And while we eye the rolling tide,
 Down which our hasting minutes glide
 Away so fast.

Let us the present hour employ,
 And deem each future dream of joy
 Already past.

Let no vain hope deceive the mind,
 No happier let us hope to find
 To-morrow than to-day :
 Our golden dreams of yore were bright ;
 Like them the present shall delight,
 Like them decay.

Our lives like hasting streams must be,
 That into one engulfing sea
 Are doom'd to fall :

The sea of death, whose waves roll on
 O'er king and kingdom, crown and throne,
 And swallow all.

Alike the river's lordly tide,
 Alike the humble riv'lets glide,
 To that sad wave ;
 Death levels poverty and pride,
 And rich and poor sleep side by side
 Within the grave.

VIRTUE AND TRUTH.

From the Dutch of Kinker.

Translated by a Westminster Reviewer.

GOODNESS and truth require no decoration ;
 They in and through themselves are great and fair ;
 All ornament is supererogation,
 Giving false colourings and fictitious air.
 Beauty is virtue's image, truth's best light,
 Virtue and truth its representatives,
 'Tis the grand girdle that, with radiance bright,
 To both—in all that are—their lustre gives.
 To its sublime control all evil bows,
 Or sneaks away, subjected to its reign,
 O'er each defect, a garb of mystery throws,
 Or seeks her midnight nakedness again.
 Error must be the lot of mortal kind,
 But virtue, in life's night, man's guide may be ;
 For man's dim eye, so weak—'tis almost blind—
 Scarce looks through mist-damps of mortality.
 Vain is endeavour !—true ; but that endeavour,
 It goodness, truth, and virtue testifies,
 Struggles and fails, but fails through weakness ever,
 Yet, failing, pours out light on darken'd eyes.
 Ye vainly dream, obscurers of the earth !
 That all is tending downwards to its fall ;
 Vain are your scoffs on manhood, and man's worth,
 And that great tendency which governs all.
 In vain, with fading and offensive flowers,
 Ye hide the chains of mental tyranny :
 Th' unhealthy spirit, lur'd to treacherous bowers,
 May joy in its free-chosen slavery,
 Call what is incomplete, degenerate ;
 God's children, bastards ; and its curses throw
 At all who bend not at its temple gate,
 Nor to night's image kneel in worship low.
 We see in the unfinish'd, tottering, frail,
 A slowly, surely, sweetly-working leaven,
 And in the childish dreams of life's low vale,
 The faint, but lovely shadowings—forth of heaven.
 We sink not, sacred ones ! but flutt'ring tend—
 Tho' weak, we tend tow'rd's God : the word we Audibly, bidding us uprise, and wend [hear,
 Our way above man's feebleness and fear.
 An idle toil is slumb'ring man's poor fate,
 And duty neither lovely looks, nor true ;
 God's mandate seems despotic—desolate
 His doings—and his voice terrific too.
 Yet duty is but deeds of loveliness,
 And truth is power to make the pris'ner free ;
 And he whose self-forg'd chains his spirit press,
 No effort shall arouse from slavery.
 What's true and good demands no decoration ;
 It, in and through itself is great and fair.
 All ornament is supererogation,
 Giving false colouring and fictitious air.

EPIGRAMS.

ODD CAUSE OF PRIDE.

JACK his own merit sees. This gives him pride
That he sees more than all the world beside.

A DIFFERENCE.

A HAUGHTY courtier, meeting in the streets
A scholar, him thus insolently greets ;
Base men to take the wall I ne'er permit ;
The scholar said, I do ; and gave him it.

THE HUMOURIST.

Imitated from Martial.

IN all thy humours, whether grave or mellow,
Thou'rt such a touchy, testy, pleasant fellow,
Hast so much wit, and mirth, and spleen, about thee,
There is no living with thee, nor without thee.

GENEROSITY.

THUS with kind words Sir Edward cheer'd his friend :
Dear Dick ! thou on my friendship may'st depend ;
I know thy fortune is but very scant ;
But, be assur'd, I'll ne'er see, Dick, in want.
Dick's soon confin'd—his friend, no doubt, would free him :
*—His word he kept—in want he ne'er wou'd see him.

DISINTERESTED ADMIRATION.

STRUT always smiles whenever he recites ;
He smiles, you think, approving what he writes ;
And yet in this no vanity is shown ;
A modest man may like what's not his own.

A BAD MEMORY.

WHEN Jack was poor, the lad was frank and free :
Of late he's grown brim-full of pride and pelf :
You wonder that he don't remember me ;
Why so ? You see he has forgot himself.

A FIT REVENGE.

LIE on ! while my revenge shall be
To speak the very truth of thee.

A LIKENESS.

WHEN Chloe's picture was to Chloe shown,
Adorn'd with charms and beauty not her own,
Where Hogarth, pitying nature, kindly made
Such lips, such eyes, as Chloe never had ;
Ye Gods ! she cries, in ecstasy of heart,
How near can nature be express'd by art !
Well ! it is wondrous like !—nay, let me die,
The very pouting lip,—the killing eye !
Blunt and severe, as Manly* in the play,
Downright replies—Like, Madam ! do you say ?
The picture bears this likeness, it is true,
The canvas painted is, and so are you.

* A character in Wycherly's comedy of The Plain Dealer.

A CURE FOR POETRY.

SEVEN wealthy towns contend for Homer dead
Through which the living Homer begg'd his bread.

CHARLES II.

Written on the Bed-chamber Door of Charles II. By Lord Rochester.

HERE lies our sovereign lord the King,
Whose word no man relies on ;
He never says a foolish thing,
Nor ever does a wise one.

A COMPLIMENT.

Written on a glass, by a Gentleman who borrowed the Earl of Chesterfield's Diamond Pencil.

ACCEPT a miracle, instead of wit ;
See two dull lines by Stanhope's pencil writ.

SUICIDE.

By Dr. Sewel.

WHEN all the blandishments of life are gone,
The coward sneaks to death, the brave live on.

WHAT IS A POET ?

By Prior.

YES, ev'ry poet is a fool :
By demonstration Ned can show it :
Happy, could Ned's inverted rule
Prove ev'ry fool to be a poet.

ON THE BUSTS IN RICHMOND HERMITAGE.

By Swift.

LEWIS the living learned fed
And raised the scientific head :
Our frugal queen, to save her meat
Exalts the head that cannot eat.

A MISTAKE.

By Prior.

As after noon one summer's day,
Venus stood bathing in a river ;
Cupid a shooting went that way,
New strung his bow, new fill'd his quiver.
With skill he chose his sharpest dart ;
With all his might his bow he drew ;
Swift to his beauteous parent's heart
The too well guided arrow flew.
I faint ! I die ! the goddess cried :
Oh cruel ! couldst thou find none other
To wreak thy spleen on ? Parricide !
Like Nero, thou hast slain thy mother.
Poor Cupid, sobbing, scarce could speak ;
Indeed, Mama, I did not know ye :
Alas ! how easy my mistake !
I took you for your likeness, Chloe.

RULE OF LIFE.

By Dr. Doddridge, on his Motto of Dum vivimus, vivamus.
 LIVE while you live, the Epicure will say,
 And take the pleasure of the present day :
 Live while you live, the sacred preacher cries,
 And give to God each moment as it flies.—
 Lord, in my view let both united be !
 I live in pleasure, when I live to Thee.

TREASON.

TREASON does never prosper ; what's the reason ?
 Why, when it prospers, none dare call it treason.

ON BUTLER.

On his Monument in Westminster Abbey.
By S. Westley.

WHILST Butler, needy wretch ! was yet alive,
 No gen'rous patron would a dinner give :
 See him, when starv'd to death, and turn'd to dust,
 Presented with a monumental bust !
 The poet's fate is here an emblem shown ;
 He ask'd for bread, and he receiv'd a stone.

THE EXCHANGE.

By Coleridge.

WE pledged our hearts, my love and I,—
 I in my arms the maiden clasping ;
 I could not tell the reason why
 But Oh ! I trembled like an aspen :
 Her father's love she bade me gain ;
 I went and shook like any reed !
 I strove to act the man—in vain !
 We had exchanged our hearts indeed.

EPITAPH ON AN INFANT.

By the same.

ERE Sin could blight or Sorrow fade,
 Death came with friendly care ;
 The opening bud to Heaven conveyed
 And bade it blossom there.

ON BAD POETS.

By the same.

SWANS sing before they die—'twere no bad thing
 Did certain persons die before they sing.

ON A BAD TRANSLATION.

HIS work now done, he'll publish it, no doubt,
 For sure I am, that murder will come out.

ON A BAD FIDDLER.

OLD Orpheus play'd so well,—he mov'd Old Nick,
 Whilst thou mov'st nothing—but thy fiddlestick.

THE SURPRISE.

By Thomas Moore.

CHLORIS, I swear by all I ever swore
 That from this hour I shall not love thee more.
 "What ! love no more ? Oh ! why this altered vow ?"
 Because I cannot love thee more than now.

A SPECULATION.

By the same.

OF all speculations the market holds forth
 The best that I know for a lover of pelf
 Is, to buy _____ up at the price he is worth³
 And then sell him at that which he sets on himself.

TIMID LOVE.

IF in that breast, so good, so pure,
 Compassion ever lov'd to dwell,
 Pity the sorrows I endure,
 The cause—I must not—dare not tell.
 That grief that on my quiet preys—
 That rends my heart—that checks my tongue—
 I fear will last me all my days,
 But feel it will not last me long.

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE.

On a Regiment sent to Oxford, and a Present of Books to Cambridge, by King George I. 1715. By Dr. Trapp.

THE king observing, with judicious eyes,
 The state of both his universities,
 To one he sent a regiment ; for why ?
 That learned body wanted loyalty :—
 To th' other he sent books, as well discerning
 How much that loyal body wanted learning.

Answered by Sir William Browne.

THE king to Oxford sent his troop of horse,
 For Tories own no argument but force.
 With equal care to Cambridge books he sent,
 For Whigs allow no force but argument.

A COURT AUDIENCE.

OLD South, a witty churchman reckon'd,
 Was preaching once to Charles the Second,
 But much too serious for a court,
 Who at all preaching made a sport,
 He soon perceiv'd his audience nod,
 Deaf to the zealous man of God.
 The doctor stopp'd ; began to call,
 "Pray 'wake the Earl of Lauderdale :
 "My lord ! why, 'tis a monstrous thing !
 "You snore so loud—you'll wake the king."
